PSCA Hears Finch Discuss Life's Goal

By LEN GOODMAN

Discussing the deep philosophical question of the purpose of man's existence and particularly the end towards which he should strive, Dr. Henry A. Finch, associate professor of philosophy, suggested at a meeting of the Penn State Christian Association Wednesday night that modern man should make of his life an "heroic adventure."

In a speech entitled "Pilgrims and Progress," Finch proposed that the modern "hero" is one who takes nature as an opportunity, and who seeks by special knowledge to increase his mastery over a strange and alien world of nature. Thus, the "hero" would say, "If my ship will make the journey, it's because I designed it true."

However, this seeking after omnipotence, which is unattainable, even though it may be approached nearer and nearer, Finch continued, is not the only motivating goal of this "hero." Included is the ethical principle that one should try to maximize his own chances of achieving his desires while at the same time, maximizing the chances of others—a sort of "maximum harmony" in society, he said.

Charis Journey
In this way, the journey through life would be charted for man, he added.

But, there have been many kinds of journeys that men have been interested in, he said. Often the search has been for a kind of "home," as in the Odyssey, he continued. Other journeys cited by Finch were the grail quests of Percival and Galihad, and the "return to paradise" movements of many authors and philosophers.

Opinions of these philosophers, such as Lucretius, Dante, and Kant, he said, have differed as to whether or not the heavenly city is in space or time, and whether or not man can attain it.

Heavenly City
Those who consider man as a pilgrim rather than a hero, Finch claimed, take the view that no one can reach the heavenly city by any efforts one could fairly call his own.

On the other hand, the hero moves toward the paradise as much as he can by his own efforts, he said. But, the hero believes that no heavenly city achieved will satisfy anyone, Finch stated, although the approach to it is necessary for contentment and progress.

Panhel Council Considers TV For Project

A half-hour television program sponsored by Panhellenic Council was suggested by Gwen Griffith, former projects committee chairman, in a report to council Tuesday. The program would feature activities conducted by sorority groups.

Miss Griffith also suggested holding fireside chats with second semester freshman women to better acquaint them with sororities and their contributions to the University.

Other recommendations included a display case in the Pattee Library for Panhel use.

It was suggested that the group continue its present projects of feeding Lion Shrine guards on football weekends and holding a Christmas party at Briarley Manor, home for the aged, near Bellefonte.

Jane Bishop was appointed head of the Panhel projects committee, replacing Miss Griffith. Council voted to make it a permanent committee and to appoint a publicity chairman.

The trophy won by council for participation in the Campus Chest Drive will be put on permanent display in the office of Mary E. Brewer.
