

Ethics and Politics Defined by Freund

By MARNIE SCHENCK

Ethics was defined as the science of the good life, and politics as the art of good government and the skill needed to obtain it, by Ernest Freund, associate professor of philosophy, at the Political Science Club Thursday.

He said good politics should, as a matter of course, achieve an ethical life, for its adherents. Three ethical theories, hedonist, Aristotelian, and Judeo-Christian offer a solution.

Ed Christmas Party To Be Held at TUB

The Education Christmas party will be held from 7:30 to 9 p.m. Thursday, in the Temporary Union Building.

Russian tea, a hot spiced punch, and cookies, will be among the remnants served. Students will dance to the music of Lynn Christy's Campusers.

The easiest solution, according to Freund, is hedonism, for its basis is pleasure. The theory holds that a life which is deficient in pleasure is, therefore, deficient in goodness. Pleasure cannot, however, be attained at another's expense, he said.

Hedonism Ambiguous

In politics, what brings pleasure to most people without harming anyone, is best. Freund says he feels the chief deficiency in this theory is its ambiguity.

In discussing the Aristotelian theory he said the basis is happiness which should as Aristotle stated be "activity of the soul in accordance with perfection." To attain perfection through exercising one's reason.

Discussing the Judeo-Christian theory, Freund said the basis as stated by Christ and in the scriptures is love of God above all, and love of our neighbor next. The good life and heaven, and not riches, should be the goal of all life, he added.

Cites Camel Parable

As an example Freund cited the parable of the rich man who could not give up his riches to follow Christ. Christ said it is easier for a camel to enter the eye of a needle than a rich man to enter the Kingdom of Heaven.

Freund said one could take values such as civil freedom, equality of opportunity, and fair play and justice and use these standards to judge current politics as to how well and to what extent they have achieved the good government—happiness.
