Wheeler points, according to Elmer Wheeler, newspaper reporter and author of the book "What to Say and When to Say It."

Everyone has a "sizzle," Wheeler writes. Some have more than others, some have sizzles deeply buried, but everyone has them if he will dig deep to find them. Thus—rule number one: Sell the "sizzle," be it friendliness, your smile, your jokes, your modesty, or above all, your You-ability (defined: play up what others, not yourself, think important.)

Sell Yourself Now

Wheeler point number two—"Don't write, telegraph." Sell yourself in the first ten seconds of speech. People form snap judgments in these days so put across your sizzle without bogging down the conversation.

"Say it with flowers." The third rule is for the dramatists. Back up what you say with some appropriate gestures and actions. Add zip to your talk and don't let it hang in mid-air.

Wheeler point number four, the solution to the age-old problem: how to let them get you right where you want them, or "Don't ask if, ask which." Give a person the choice between something and something rather than between something and nothing. They'll be so busy deciding which is the lesser of the two evils that they'll forget they didn't want to do either in the first place.

Watch Your Bark

The fifth Wheeler point, which is vital to the success of the other four, is "Watch your Bark." Your best sizzle will be lost if the tone of your voice is flat. Vary it in speed, in pitch, and in volume.

Wheeler offers some advice to those who often find themselves at a loss for words. For instance, what should a coed say to take the wind out of the professional heartbreaker? Not the usual "I've heard that line before." Just ask, "Then what did you do?"

To flatter a genuinely beautiful woman, don't remark on her lovely eyes, fellows. Ask her what she thinks of the new cabinet proposal. She's heard the other stuff before. Show her you value her mind.

Spring in February

If your mate (roommate in this case) reads in bed, how can you break him of the habit peacefully? If it's a him, ask him to read out loud. He'd rather put the book away. If it's a her, warn her of the bags that form under eyes from late hours. A woman's vanity is tantamount.

So your fellow needs a haircut? Don't pull the old gag about the violin player, and forget the Samson routine. Just ask him if his barber moved.

When you've made a mistake, don't go into extensive excuses and apologies. Just say, "It was my fault. I'm sorry." The other fellow is so set for a string of excuses that you knock the wind out of him by admitting your blame.

Ever have a question thrown at you that you weren't too eager, or able to answer? Use the old politician's methods—return question for question. Ask "Why?" If they beat you to the punch and ask "Why?" first, say "Why do you ask me why?"

In spite of all the fancy phrases and oratories, there are two words that still remain the most famous and effective in the entire world, Wheeler maintains. Say them in any language, but say them with your whole face—that's "Thank you."

Pattee's Book Called 'Zestful,' 'Sharp' in Review

Concise, sharp, and zestful are the words used in the "Saturday Review" to describe "Penn State Yankee: The Autobiography of Fred Lewis Pattee."

The book is reviewed in the Feb. 20 issue by Sculley Bradley, professor of English at the University of Pennsylvania.

Bradley said, "The book tells of an engaging individual, self-made and well-made. His writing is concise, sharp and zestful, in the best tradition of upstate New Hampshire, where he was born in 1863. Abounding in the author's shrewd comments on events and personalities the book will be of interest to many readers."

It shows a lack of style and organization compared to his best writing, but this is because the author didn't prepare the book for publication, Bradley said.

When Pattee came to Penn State, the college was small and hidden in the unsettled hills of central Pennsylvania. Pattee also had to conquer the general superstition of the day toward the land grant colleges. At Penn State he became the only formal teacher of American literature in the country.

Bradley says that Pattee's book "A History of American Literature Since 1870," written when he was 52, brought to Americans the new national literature. This first literary history of a new nation showed the literary power of the West and reborn South.

Bradley says Pattee's real worth to the literary world is not his writing, but his faith and courage and lifelong battle for the study of our native literature.
