Clique Registration: A Wise Readoption

The All-University elections committee decision to readopt its old system of clique registration is a good step for campus politics.

The elections committee returned to its old method of requiring attendance at two of three clique meetings for membership in the clique. This means a student who wishes to vote in All-University and class officer nominations must attend one clique meeting previous to nominations.

Last semester a not too successful experiment in politics was tried, a by-product of Student Encampment. This system made it necessary for every student to register clique affiliation with the elections committee before he could vote in clique nominations. Two primary faults were evident in that now defunct system.

First, the system allowed students to attend clique meetings and elect clique officers without belonging to the clique. Registration with the elections committee did not come until after some clique meetings had already been held. Under this system, one party could conceivably pack the other party's meeting and gain control of the opposing clique.

In the second place, many more students registered with the elections committee than turned out for final clique meetings where class officers were nominated. Fraternities, sororities, and independent groups pushed members to register in case one of their members had a chance for nomination. When those chances for nomination fell through many students who had registered failed to show up at the nomination meeting. Result: unnecessary registration work for the elections committee.

That system was introduced last fall to make it easier for students to become clique members, and to give campus politics a shot in the arm. It did make it easier for students to become clique members. But this was a superficial shot in the arm, for most of those who registered failed to take any part in clique affairs.

Return to the old system of clique registration has been a wise move. Less students may register for clique membership, but those who do will take part in campaigns and the election. They will not quit politics after their friends have lost chances for party or class offices.

On Brotherhood

"If you hate me because I'm unclean, I'll wash. If you hate me because I'm ignorant, I'll learn. But if you hate me because of the color of my skin, then you must also hate the God who gave it to me."

The man who said this had never heard of Brotherhood Week or Religion in Life programs. He didn't learn about racial equality in a sociology class. He never attended an interfaith service. But he lived religion and brotherhood, even though he could spell neither word. The jury that convicted him could spell both.

We, at the end of another Brotherhood Week, will return to our sociology classes. We'll learn about George Washington Carver and Ralph Bunche. But many of us will keep the principles of brotherhood on our lips, not letting them penetrate our hearts.

Certainly, the intellectual influences of a university environment teach us about racial equality, interfaith sharing, and brotherly love. We can discuss them intelligently, and write about them effectively. But not until we learn to live them—all year round, in all environments—will we be as educated as that philosopher who never went to school.

UJA: Our Part

The 1954 United Jewish Appeal campaign at the University will begin Monday evening and will conclude that same evening under a new plan of the Hillel Foundation. Solicitors will canvass the Jewish student body in dormitories and the borough in the hope of adding a student contribution to the $119 million goal of the national drive.

This year, money collected in the national UJA campaign is earmarked for the aid of hundreds of thousands both outside and inside Israel, but especially to rehabilitate the handicapped immigrants coming to Israel, and to eliminate the "tent cities."

The need is urgent this year, as in the past. Though not in a state of national emergency, Israel remains encircled by a group of hostile neighbors bent on her destruction.

Who knows how much effect the contribution of the Jewish student of this University will have. But, each contributor needn't give his last dollar to make his contribution count.

Collegiate Chatter

By LORRAINE GLADUS

A coeducational dormitory, which caused many eyebrows to be raised when it was built, recently celebrated its first anniversary at Bemidji State Teachers' College in Minnesota. So far there have been no mishaps or moral violations.

It's residents—quartered under the same roof but in separate wings of the structure—are all in favor of the coeducational idea. They meet each other in a lobby between the wings.

"It seems to establish a more wholesome point of view than if the boys and girls were chasing back and forth across the campus," says one male student.

"Teaches us how to live with other people and be more tolerant," adds a coed.

Another student comments, "We don't have foolishness like party raids. Mutual respect develops when we see the girls on everyday terms."

The editors of the school newspaper of the University of Georgia are in trouble because of a series of editorials on racial segregation in education.

An influential Georgia newspaperman and a powerful member of the state legislature have threatened removal of support of the paper if statements like "It is plain as the red flag in Russia that continued segregation and suppression can and will cause the death of democracy at the hands of its own leaders" are repeated in the paper.

The newspaperman warned the editors that the people of Georgia would not be willing to support a university which advocated the mixing and mingling of the races.

His warning was heeded, but not in the way he expected. The paper undertook to attack the newspaperman personally claiming a "squelch" of the fundamental right of freedom of the press.

The threat of withdrawal of financial support was remade, indicating that funds would be withdrawn if the school editors didn't cease what was called "juvenile tomfoolery."

A scientific expedition from Duke University will strike out into the Sahara desert to study camels. Presumably it's be the regular 30-day test.

College instructors are expected to maintain the utmost poise at all times; a feat which sometimes requires great courage and willpower. A professor at the University of Maryland was forced to show the epitome of nonchalance when confronted with a dead alligator on his podium upon his arrival in class. He unobtrusively dropped the thing into a wastepaper basket and went on with his lecture as though nothing had happened.

From the Technology News of Illinois Tech:

A college student is like a kerosene lamp—not very bright—smokes—often goes out at night—and usually gets turned down.

Smith College's student newspaper, the Sophian, has reported members of the sophomore class cut more classes than any other group.

Reasons given for cutting include studying for examinations, dull classes, and out of town weekends that conflict with Saturday classes.

Commented an editorial writer, "The reasons or excuses for missing class reveal neither maturity nor responsibility."

From the Georgia Tech Technique:

Guest: (to host in new home) "Well old boy, how do you find it here?"

The rising price of coffee has made its mark on University life. No longer going out for coffee, students are now making popular the "malt" hour, using either the beverage made with ice cream or the one made from yeast. You pay your money and you take your choice, as the saying goes.

Northwestern University has a rule that permits students to kiss goodnight at the door of the dorm—provided the couple keeps all four feet on the ground.

Freshman: "I don't know."
Sophomore: "I am not prepared."

Junior: "I do not remember."
Senior: "I don't believe that I can add anything to what has been said."

An ex-convict was picked up by campus police at UCLA. The suspect had been making a living since December by stealing from the campus and from the University of Southern California. He was apprehended by campus patrolmen when he broke into a car and tried to run off with two suitcases and a woman's coat.
