Tito Calls Himself Despot, Atheist, Red

(First in a series of two articles based on an interview with Carroll D. Champlin, professor emeritus, who talked with Marshall Tito, dictator of Yugoslavia, last summer.)

By PHYLLIS PROPERT

"I am a dictator, a Communist, and an atheist," Marshall Tito, head of the Yugoslav government, told members of the Good Will Seminar last summer.

But he added that he was a humanitarian dictator. The Yugoslav president said his people had been suppressed by other rulers, but now he wanted his people and his country to have a more honored position among other countries of the world.

Carroll D. Champlin, professor emeritus, was among the 41 Americans to interview Tito at his summer home on Brioni Island.

Professional People on Tour Mr. and Mrs. Champlin of State College were members of the seminar which took a 54-day tour. The group was composed of professional people, clergymen, professors, writers, lecturers, and social workers.

In the interview Tito said he was going to reestablish his country's position in the world by helping his people gain self-respect and by providing strong ethical leadership, Champlin said.

Tito expressed his desire of making this "real" communism experiment in Yugoslavia a lasting one, the educator said.

Seminar to Obtain Ideas The seminar's purpose was to obtain ideas about other countries, to show the United States' willingness to be friends with the rest of the world, and to express the United States' wish for a peaceful world.

Josip Broz, or Tito, which is his national or political name, sent two men with his launch, Brioni, to take the group from the Yugoslav town of Pula to the island.

The group was on the Adriatic Sea 40 minutes before they reached Tito's summer home. While they were on the launch, Champlin said, they noticed that, beneath the foliage and brush of the neighboring islands, the entire region appeared to be well fortified.

Tito Met Group Personally Tito, accompanied by his dog and a few plainclothesmen, met the group personally at the dock, and shook hands with each member of the group.

He made a handsome, bronzed appearance, Champlin said. Dressed in a light gray suit, he led the way to his new modern stone summer home. The Champlins with the other members of the group were seated at a table with the Yugoslav president. Tito's attendants offered them a variety of refreshments, Champlin said, and Tito exerted himself to be a good host.

Although the group was watched carefully, Champlin said, they felt that Tito knew of their purpose and therefore felt more at ease with them. But Champlin added that he'd seen a few men equipped with guns ready for any emergency.

Dictator Flanked by Two The dictator was flanked by two men, one of whom took down every word that was said by the members of the group, and the other, who wrote down Tito's remarks and answers to the Americans' questions. When the Americans returned home, Champlin said, they found waiting for them a detailed report, word for word, of the proceedings of the meeting.

Tito speaks three other languages besides English, Champlin said, but his English was very poor. He would start his answer to a question in English only to get stuck, the traveler said, and then find it necessary for an interpreter to take over.

Champlin to Ask Questions Champlin was one of eight members chosen as the group's representatives to ask Tito questions. Champlin, because of his position as an educator and his interest in religion, asked Tito for his opinions on schools, citizenship, religion, and materialism.

Tito emphatically told of his dislike of America's Wall Street capitalism, but he also added, Champlin said, that he disliked Stalin's type of communism equally as much. (Yugoslavia had separated politically from Russia in 1948.) Tito spoke of Yugoslavia's willingness to look to the West for many things, Champlin said.

Changed Minds Champlin, who had seen Yugoslavia pro-Stalin at the Youth Festival in Prague in 1947, asked Tito how he had coped with Reds when he decided to separate from Moscow. Tito answered that his government, as well as all of Yugoslavia, had changed their minds.

Champlin said that Tito gave this reason for Yugoslavia's modified outlook and new program: Yugoslavia was made to pay three or four times as much for an imported product from Russia than it was worth, Tito said. But in return, the dictator said, on Yugoslavia's exports to Russia, Russia would pay only one-third or one-fourth of what the product was worth.

At that time, Champlin said, the papers were carrying rumors of Stalin's willingness to take Tito back into his fold. Tito said that if he should go back with Stalin, despite the promises of peace and forgiveness, his people were afraid that he soon would be done away with, Champlin said. Tito smiled and added, Champlin said, that he had no desire to be liquidated.
