State College Aids With H-Bomb Films

By DOTTIE STONE

Life photographers, rushing to meet their Sunday morning deadline in New York City, used the facilities of the Penn State Photo Shop to develop the first color photographs of the hydrogen bomb tests.

The Army took the only color movie of the explosion at Eniwetok last week. After being censored, the film was turned over to the Atomic Energy Commission in Washington for safe-keeping.

This film will be released to the public on Wednesday, but Life magazines told their staff they wanted an exclusive article with eight pages of color pictures—at any expense. The magazine comes out on Thursday morning, and the latest possible date for getting material to their printer was early Sunday morning.

Through their Harrisburg correspondent, Lindy Lindgren, Life learned that Congressman James A. Van Zandt, senior member of the Atomic Energy Commission, had the film with him on his campaigning tours in Pennsylvania.

After much persuasion on Saturday morning, Van Zandt gave permission for the film to be used for making still pictures, but Life had to come to either Altoona, Bellefonte or State College. It was Lindgren who knew State College and Robert F. Breon's studio.

Life flew their top color man, Fritz Goro, and their best color technician, Herbert Orth, with over 400 pounds of equipment to Harrisburg. They picked up Lindgren and rushed to State College, arriving about 2 a.m.

In Breon's basement darkroom they worked against an impossible deadline, making calls to New York and Washington, getting hourly extensions from the magazine and Van Zandt.

By 7:30 p.m. they had made 40 frames (a section of film) from over 1000 frames of film tape. They developed three pictures of each still shot, although not more than eight will probably be used, Breon said.

To get to State College, via Harrisburg, Goro and Orth stayed up all night, their third in a row, and spent Saturday night getting back to New York and finishing up their work. The pictures were turned over to the printer at 6 a.m. Sunday morning, and will probably be used in this week's edition of Life magazine.
