

Lion's Paw Controversy --

his motion, saying that it is important that Lion's Paw be kept out of political parties. He inferred that previously Lion's Paw had been involved in politics and that Kirschner, and later himself, had been among the first "to buck them."
Sinclair pointed out that five of eight encampment workshops this year are headed by members of Lion's Paw. He said there had been many "glaring omissions" in invitations to encampment.
Earlier, Goslin had questioned the validity of the invitations also. He pointed to the list of the "ten outstanding freshmen" as compiled by the sophomore class project committee and noted that some of these men had not received encampment invitations, although they were judged by an impartial group to be the most outstanding in their class.

Kenneth Williams, third semester arts and letters major, also voiced opposition to the manner in which encampment invitations were issued.
Thomas Kidd spoke in favor of Lion's Paw saying that the organization promoted friendship among student leaders. "These leaders will get together whether they are organized or not," he said.
He added that Lion's Paw was no more or no less secret than any fraternity. He attributed the fault with the group to the fact that in the past its members have tried to make it secret.

"We must shoulder the sins of the past and accept them," he said. I am sure that if Cabinet wants to scrutinize the individual members, they will stand up to it."
He defended the closed meetings of the organization by saying that a closed session gives members a chance to "cuss each other out" if they deem it necessary, "in a way that you would not hear on the floor of cabinet, or any other student body."
Robert Dennis, president of the Association of Independent Men, declared that Lion's Paw is no more consulted by the administration than the individual members are consulted as leaders of their respective groups.
"If I am not capable of answering a question brought to me on my own, I may go to anyone for help, not excluding Lion's Paw," Dennis said.

Kidd also defended Paw by saying that the idea is nothing new. He pointed out that other schools have similar organizations which serve as discussion groups for student leaders.

The Interfraternity Council did not vote to accept maximum wages to be paid to housemothers next fall as reported in the Daily Collegian yesterday.
According to John Carpenter, IFC President, the maximum wages were suggestions which he submitted to the council after he investigated the problem.
