Breakfast, Sir?

Thirty-three white rats were sent to Waynesboro yesterday by the University to be used in an experiment being conducted by two University professors. The experiment is entitled the "Better Breakfast Plan."

The experiment is under the direction of Dr. H. Bruce Bylund, assistant professor of rural sociology at the University. Dr. Bylund is being assisted by Dr. Katherine H. Fisher, assistant professor of food and nutrition, and the Franklin County Extension Service.

According to Dr. Fisher, a number of white rats were distributed to various classrooms throughout the Waynesboro Area School System and different types of breakfasts—the inadequate, the average, and the better breakfast—will be fed to the animals to illustrate health conditions which are reflected by the three diets.

If the rats follow form, they will be small, medium-sized, and big, depending on their breakfast menus, by the time the experiment is completed at the end of the month.

It is hoped that the experiment will show the youngsters the need for a good breakfast, Dr. Bylund said.

The biggest problem, according to Dr. Bylund, is to keep the sympathetic children from slipping "extras" to the undernourished animals and upsetting the test.

Waynesboro was chosen, Dr. Bylund said, because it is typical of many Pennsylvania towns of its size. Lessons learned by using Waynesboro as a pilot community will be applied to similar educational programs to be conducted throughout the Commonwealth, he said.
