

Buchanan Stresses Realistic Attitude

By GINGER HANCE

Realism in solving problems is necessary before and after marriage, Helen E. Buchanan told approximately 150 people who attended last night's final session of the three-day Marriage Conference.

Mrs. Buchanan, instructor in family relations, defined love as mutual responsiveness, in which two people meet the need for each other. She described it as a symbiotic relationship in which two people work for each other.

Deep love, she said, is only a foundation. Marriages must then be built on this foundation. Courtship should give couples time before marriage to determine that affection is really love, she said.

Work Out Problems

Individuals should try to work out their problems during courtship and engagement and build their marriage on united beliefs.

The first adjustment Mrs. Buchanan described as "paired unity," thinking as WE, not I. Each partner has to give up some of the previous pleasures he enjoyed when single and adjust to the new roles marriage demands of him.

When questioned on a woman's having a career in addition to the role of housewife, Mrs. Buchanan agreed with the woman's right to put her years of college to use, but believes with the arrival of children, the mother's place is in the home.

Problems in Background

Other problems confronting people contemplating marriage are the differences in background, Mrs. Buchanan said. She stressed the differences in family cultures and the need for compromise. People tend to observe the patterns established in the home by their parents, she said.

Personality differences must be taken into consideration. In marital relations, Mrs. Buchanan reported, psychologists maintain that less than 5 per cent of the sexually maladjusted would have these problems if they were psychologically compatible. The ability to give and receive affection, she said, is something one learns in early childhood.

Mrs. Buchanan said couples should live apart from in-laws
