Court Is Convened

Spring Carnival—and with it the entire Spring Week—goes on trial tonight. We hope the students win.

The carnival will be watched to see if it is more harmful to the University in the form of bad publicity than it is helpful in the form of thousands of dollars added to the Penn State Student Scholarship fund.

If its judges—the University administration and students themselves—find it harmful, Spring Week will go. No one wants to see this happen but it is up to the participants tonight and tomorrow to see that it does not happen. Poor taste, as universally defined, will be the determining factor.

Other than the inability of the coronation committee to come up with a celebrity to crown Miss Penn State (Miss Pennsylvania, who finally substituted to crown Miss Penn State, originally was scheduled to be a judge), Spring Week has been a credit to its planners and the University.

We hope the quest for tickets at the Carnival tonight and tomorrow does not undermine the good sense shown so far. We hope so for the sake of future Spring Weeks.

Consider the Student

Which is more important—the health of hundreds of students or making a good impression before a major general? This is a question we asked after the Air Force Reserve Officers' Training Corps Wing II had Leadership Laboratory yesterday afternoon in a steady spring downpour.

Surely, the health of the students is more important.

The reason for holding the Leadership Laboratory, as cited by an advanced Cadet officer, was to prepare for a review by a major general Tuesday in front of Old Main.

Col. Daniel F. Riva, professor of air science, said yesterday that he was unaware Leadership Laboratory was held. He went on to say the decision was left to Cadet officers.

Although the Cadets were dismissed early, they still remained in the rain long enough to be exposed to possible illness.

The health of the men should be the first thought of the AFROTC. However, it seems the men's health took a back seat yesterday to a pat-on-the-back from an Air Force officer.

Better judgment should be used in the future.
