Chest—

(Continued from page one) committee of seven students including the general chairman, to organize and execute the drive. At present, Riggs heads a committee of 12 student chairmen of Chest committees and a secretary and assistant. Riggs was requested by Cabinet to write a full report on the situation and present it to the body at next week's meeting.

Drive Dates Set
The 1955 Campus Chest drive will be held Oct. 18 through 21. Fred Seipt, agriculture student council president and president of Inter-College Council Board, moved that Cabinet institute vice presidents of the college councils as members of CPIC instead of the presidents, as membership stands now.

He also asked that the chairman of the group be elected from the members of CPIC at its first meeting. In the past, the president has been elected by ICCB. Both recommendations were passed by Cabinet.

Reasons Given
Reasons for the changes as given by Seipt and All-University President Earl Seely included these points: that the vice presidents would receive good experience; that women would be given a chance to work on the committee; and that it would enable the group to begin working sooner than if the presidents would be able to.

Cabinet approved the appointments of five students to Cabinet committees. They were: Robert Bahrenburg, junior in engineering from Erie, chairman of the Joint Committee on Town Affairs; Robert Cole, junior in arts and letters from Bryn Athyn, Town Independent Men representative on the Joint Committee on Town Affairs.

Nancy Seiler, junior in arts and letters from Cheltenham, Cabinet Secretarial Committee; Robert McMillan, Senior class president, Ring Committee chairman, and Julie Mayberry, junior in business administration from Bradford, Cabinet Foods Committee chairman.

Cabinet sent recommendations for the appointments of their students to Dr. Henry S. Brunner, chairman of the Senate Committee on Student Affairs. The three, asked for membership to the Academic Honesty Committee are Ann Nitrauer, Norman Miller, and Curtin Schafer.

Centennial Lore

First Students Found Life Rugged

Bleak acres of uncultivated farmland, an unfinished main building, and grounds strewn with stones and construction materials greeted 69 students when they arrived February 16, 1859, for the opening of the Farmers' High School of Pennsylvania, forerunner of the University.

The austere outlook and the prospect of a grim, Spartan existence was in sharp contrast to conditions facing the 12,000 students who today populate a modern campus.

Tired after a jolting ride by stage from Spruce Creek or Lewistown, the nearest railroad stations, the young pioneers entered the school building (predecessor of Old Main, now the administration building) that was only one-third completed.

There were no dining rooms, bathrooms, kitchens or chapel and, according to a contemporary description, the structure presented "a most forlorn aspect to the students who first entered the building through the well-tramped mud of the breaking up of the winter frosts."

The absence of janitors forced the students to carry their own trunk, many of them up five flights of stairs. The dark halls were illuminated by lard oil lamps and the students were expected to study by candlelight.

Buildings Described
Kitchen and dining facilities were set up in two drafty workmen's shanties. Other existing structures were a large and commodious barn, a frame dwelling occupied by one of the professors, and a laundry. The nearby village (now the thriving community of State College) consisted of exactly three houses.

The first students were welcomed by a four-man faculty. Since a president had not yet been appointed, Horticulture Professor William G. Waring, a practical farmer and nurseryman, who had been employed to plan the grounds and farming operations, served as acting principal. He was the great-grandfather of Fred Waring, prominent orchestra leader alumnus and trustee of the university.

The new students were examined and divided into two classes, one to be graduated in three years and the other in four. They were assigned in pairs to rooms chosen by lot.

Only one course of study was provided in the original curriculum, and the primary aim was instruction in the theory and practice of agriculture. Students studied chemistry, practical agriculture, botany, horticulture, natural philosophy, zoology, mathematics and English. From its beginning, the Farmers' High School operated at a collegiate level.

Student Regulations
Students in the University's first year, who grew in number to 119, had to be at least 16 years old. According to the 1859 catalogue, they also had to "possess a good knowledge of reading, writing, geography, arithmetic and English grammar" and "present satisfactory evidence of good moral character."

Fees were fixed at $100 and students were required to furnish light for their rooms and to buy their own textbooks. The young men were told to provide themselves with "two suits of ordinary clothes for wearing while working," in addition to their clothes for study hours.

A few days after their arrival, the new students embarked on an arduous routine which would shock today's collegians. The rising bell sounded at 5:45 a.m. and the day was crammed with compulsory chapel, recitations, lectures, study and three hours of required farm labor.

200 Register For Training In Leadership

Over 200 students have registered for the leadership training program which will begin an eight-week span of 90-minute sessions Wednesday, James Musser, program administrator, has announced.

Students and faculty members will instruct the enrollees in student government and techniques of committees, public relations, parliamentary procedure, and business meetings.

Among those scheduled to speak at the sessions are Harold W. Perkins, assistant dean of men, on leadership; Emory J. Brown, assistant professor of rural sociology, on committee techniques; and Dr. Joseph F. O'Brian, professor of public speaking, on parliamentary procedure.

All-University president Earl Seely and several class and student council officers will speak on student government.

Senior Grid Tickets—

(Continued from page one) type of seating arrangement came from Robert Bullock, president of Inter-Fraternity Council. The old system used last year could not be used because the athletic books are the same color for all four classes, he said.

Moorhead said the alternative was to admit students to the sections for which they have tickets.

In other business, Seely instructed representatives to notify the secretary-treasurer when an alternative attends a session for them. On the note should appear the Cabinet members name, position and reason for absence.

Harold Dean was secretary-treasurer last night, replacing Philip Beard, who is in the infirmary.
