

It Always Rains on Homecoming Weekends

It always rains for homecoming weekends.

At least it has for the past three years. And indications so far are that this year will be no exception. But the weatherman has promised the skies may be clear by game time this afternoon.

Until then, rain is expected to continue.

Last year, Hurricane Hazel was an uninvited guest to the homecoming festivities. She blew in from New York State with 60-mile-an-hour winds, dumping 3.5 inches of rain on the campus in a 16 hour period.

Fraternity pledges stood by and watched while their gigantic—but by no means waterproof—lawn displays were washed down the drain by the haughty hurricane.

One fraternity, seeing its display ruined, posted a sign "Hazel Was Here."

One student commented "The theme of this weekend is 'There's been some changes made.' No doubt the alumni will notice there's been no change in the weather.

But this year's homecoming won't be quite as bad according to the weatherman. It promises to be only an ordinary rain-filled Penn State weekend.

Yesterday, The Daily Collegian camera caught students as they plodded through an ordinary rain-soaked day.

No, there's been no change, alumni, it still rains at Penn State.

It was nice on campus Thursday.

Oops—almost didn't make it.

It didn't rain for the BU game.

But it rained on campus yesterday.

A Daily Collegian Photo-Feature

By RON WALKER