

Private Bus Service Relieves Eight Month Scranton Strike

SCRANTON, Pa., Dec. 2 (AP)—The people of Scranton, deprived of public transportation by a strike of more than eight months, finally got bus service today.

Three privately-owned bus companies began furnishing substitute service on an emergency basis with Public Utility Commission approval.

The service began over the objections of the strike-bound Scranton Transit Co. and Division 168, AFL-Amalgamated Assn. of Street, Electric Railway and Motorcoach Employees.

Fares charged by the bus lines ranged from 10 to 15 cents, depending on the routes taken, as compared with a flat rate of 18 cents charged by the Scranton Transit Co.

Beginning the substitute service were the Martz, Swingle and Laurel Line bus companies, with special certificates from the PUC at Harrisburg.

All of these companies normally operate through-service at Scranton, with stops only at terminals. Until today the lines were not permitted to discharge or take on passengers at any place but the terminals.

Under the new PUC authorization they now are permitted to make stops at street corners, but service still must be maintained only over their regular routes. This means that some sections of the city will remain without bus service.

First day service under the new emergency setup was not too heavily used. It was believed that people did not hear of the project in time and that also they continued other means of getting to work—principally car pools.

Mayor James T. Hanlon, who has approved the substitute service, said people probably will take advantage of it in greater numbers by next Monday, when weekly car pool arrangements terminate.

would be by using closed-circuit television, he said.

Seeking possible solutions along other lines, Dr. Eurich said that some colleges would do well to reorganize their courses. Many college courses, he said, overlap with high school courses and the students' time is almost wasted.

Some high schools, he added, are permitted to give college credits for their advanced courses. Other schools allow outstanding students to enter college a year early, he said.

To increase the productivity of the professors, less skilled persons might perform some of their easier tasks, leaving them more time for instructing, he said.

But no single one of these proposals, which are being tested in different parts of the country, will solve the problem.

The final desire is to create an intellectual climate in the United States which would release in-woman with her youth in the past.

But her boy "friend" Howie, played beautifully by Clyde Gore, gathers up much of the brightness and amusement in the play. But he carries out equally as well the undertone of truth of the drama.

Helen Potts, neighbor on the left, has her moment too. Played by Joan Campbell, she brightens her sad life only through the romance of the neighbors.

Others in the supporting cast are Helen Cummings and Audrey Sassano, who play the roles of two school teachers.

COME TO CHURCH

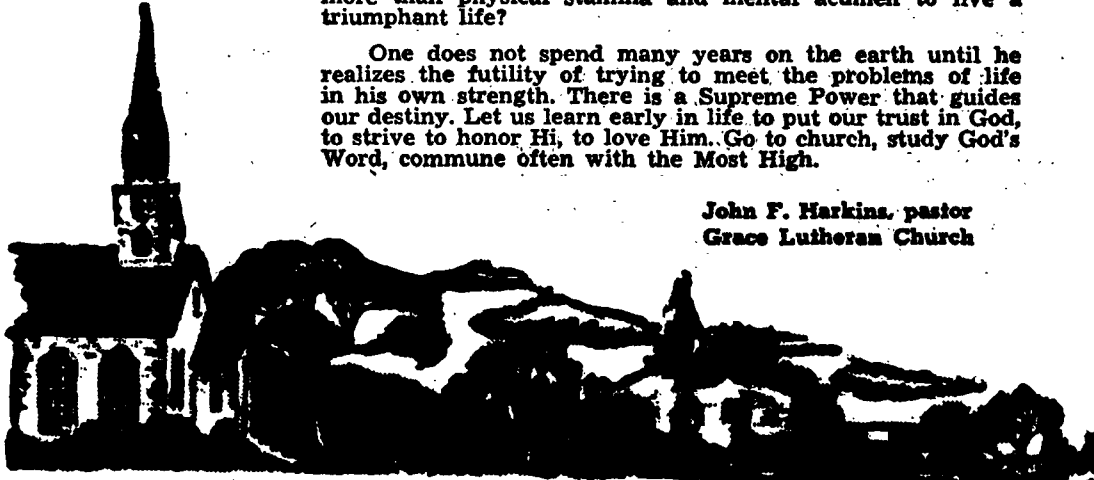

The Way They See It

Who can estimate the value of faith in God as it gives poise to life in the face of danger and threatened disaster? Life for all of us is almost certain to be spotted with tragic experiences. Is anyone of us strong enough to "go it" alone? Can we climb the "hills of difficulty" and sash through the "sloughs of despond" in our own strength? Does man need more than physical stamina and mental acumen to live a triumphant life?

One does not spend many years on the earth until he realizes the futility of trying to meet the problems of life in his own strength. There is a Supreme Power that guides our destiny. Let us learn early in life to put our trust in God, to strive to honor Him, to love Him. Go to church, study God's Word, commune often with the Most High.
