

Orchestra's Life Span Limited to One Program

James W. Dunlop, assistant professor of music education, will conduct a 100-piece orchestra next week with perhaps the shortest life span of any musical group.

Dunlop is in charge of the Future Farmers of America orchestra which will provide the music for the single performance of the annual pageant at the 80th Pennsylvania Farm Show in Harrisburg.

Once the Tuesday night performance is completed, the orchestra will disband, having played together for only one show.

Dunlop, who is also director of the Blue Band, has put together an orchestra for the annual affair for the past six years. He starts his work early in June of each year for the next January performance.

Hundreds of FMA members from all over the state converge at the University at that time for a three-day tryout and rehearsal period. At the end of the three days, 100 persons are chosen for the final orchestra. The members then pack away their instruments, and return to their homes.

Rehearsals Start Sunday

On Sunday, the 100 members will meet at the Arena in Harrisburg for their first rehearsal for the pageant since last June. In the next two days, the band memorizes the arrangements and polishes up for the big performance.

This year the band will give two additional performances on Wednesday and Thursday afternoon, thus prolonging the ending a bit.

Each year Dunlop starts all over again to create a new orchestra. A few musicians return from year to year, but most are new members.

FFA Chorus to Sing

The 30-voice FFA chorus, under the direction of Frank A. Bortz, will also be heard at the farm show. Bortz, a sophomore in agriculture education from Shelocta, originated the chorus at the University this fall. The group had its premier at the Ag Hill Party in November.

The chorus will join with two other groups from Pennsylvania for a performance Wednesday night. The group will also give several concerts on the floor of the Arena at farm displays during the show.
