

HEc Faculty Disapproves Of Dishonesty Approach

Department heads of the College of Home Economics yesterday expressed dislike of the "negative approach" of the letter sent to faculty members explaining the new academic honesty program.

The department head also said they thought the program could be supplemented by faculty members through their lectures and office hours.

One department head said the letter to the faculty could have had a "more diplomatic approach" by not putting all the responsibility of academic honesty on the faculty.

The student must learn the importance of academic honesty to himself and find a place where it is important to him in his life, a department head said.

She said this could be done through education.

Came From Encampment
The topic of academic honesty was brought up as a result of discussion of proposals from the 1955 Student Encampment, held last September at the Mont Alto Forest School.

The department heads, Dr. Grace M. Henderson, dean of the College, and student leaders in the College, including John Seastone, Student Council president, attended the informal meeting.

Dr. Henderson said that the faculty of the College has been informed and "will be going along with the new academic honesty plan."

Discussion also led to why many students in the College are not allowed to keep examinations after they have been returned.

Couldn't Keep Exams
The majority of the students present said they were not allowed to keep most of the corrected examinations.

Dr. Henderson and the majority of the department heads said they did not know of any such ruling, but several said they had been informed of such a ruling.

Dr. Henderson said she and the department heads will look into the matter.

Also discussed was the "overlapping of courses," which some students present thought occurred in the College.

This was discussed earlier this month by the Student Council.

Dr. Henderson asked Barbara Larpenteur, senior in home economics, Sally McKnight, junior in home economics, and Rhona Synnestvedt, senior in home economics, and any other students present to form a committee and report to her on the findings of where overlapping occurs.

Dorothy Stone, copy editor of The Daily Collegian and a member of the Encampment Committee on Communications, explained the workings of that committee. Miss Stone said the committee proposed the establishment of a Board of Communications, which would take the place of the present Board of Publications.

Dr. Henderson asked Miss Stone to check on how the College's magazine, News and Views, could become a member of the proposed board.
