printing press. The idea has since been dropped and the money was invested in bonds.

It was also suggested to Cabinet that the College of Physical Education and Athletics might donate $6000 insurance money it received after a recreation cabin burned several years ago.

However, Tuesday Ernest B. McCoy, dean of the Physical Education College, said his college had no money to contribute towards the project.

The Beaver Dam Project, when completed, would consist of an artificial lake covering 20 acres, a central building which will accommodate 200 persons in its dining halls, and four units of cabins and tents for campers.

Sheltered outdoor cooking areas and hiking trails, electrical and water facilities, and a mile long paved road from the main highway to the area, will also be considered in the project.

Cabinet will also give second approval to a recommendation to purchase a $2359.70 piano for Recreation Hall.

Cabinet accepted the recommendation of the Inter-Class Finance Board to purchase the Steinway grand piano after it was pointed out that the existing piano at Rec Hall is in poor condition.

Philip Beard, retiring All-University secretary-treasurer, asked Cabinet members to seriously consider the purchase and express their thoughts at tonight's meeting before the final vote is taken, in view of the narrow margin which the proposal was passed by last week. Cabinet voted 12-8 to purchase the piano at its last meeting.

Is oratory dying?
Harold P. Zelko, professor of public speaking, is quoted on the subject of oratory in the current issue of Cosmopolitan magazine. Zelko says that the oratory of yore, such as practiced by William Jennings Bryan and others, is all but extinct. He credits the passing of this type of oratory to the microphone which roots the speaker to one spot and permits no shouting, strutting, or acrobatics. Rigid radio and television time limits; new source of entertainment to replace the orator, and the higher education and greater sophistication of present-day audiences were also listed as reasons.
