

Encampment Airs Publication Plan

(Last of a Series)

The investigation of a central circulation system, in an attempt to improve circulation of several student publications, was recommended to the Board of Publications by Student Encampment.

The Board, composed of editors of student periodicals, would directly control the circulation staff if it is found feasible.

The idea was suggested in the workshop "Communications and Health," because it has been indicated literary magazines in general would benefit by an experienced circulation staff.

Need Broader Scope

Literary magazines, the group said, would have better success if they were of broader scope and included several phases of the arts. It was also recommended that writers should be obtained from various fields rather than limiting the staff of such publications to liberal arts students.

Concerning another phase of communication, the workshop suggested that All-University Cabinet appoint and request a committee composed of WDFM representatives and members of the administration to investigate the possibilities and practicality of a closed circuit radio station, an AM station or advancing the present work on transponders.

Health Committee Asked

Properly informing students about the University Health Service was suggested by the workshop also. The group recommended that a committee be set up from advisory boards so that, in case of rumors concerning health treatment, this committee should meet with health service officials and attempt to explain the correct information to the student body.

Other recommendations concerning health were:

1. Hat society counselors should be informed about the Health Service program and discuss this with freshmen during orientation week.
2. The required freshman health courses should be revised to include emphasis on the responsibility of dental and health care in community living.
3. The Health Service pamphlet which is sent to incoming freshmen should be revised to include information on dental care and its necessity—to be directed to parents as well as students.

tion of a recent customs violator, William Angliss, to dispense with dress customs after 5 p.m. until the termination of the program.

Board members said that several reports had been received that upperclass students were acting as imposters in calling so-called "freshman violators," and requesting them to appear before the board for questioning.

The board said that members who call violators identify themselves by name and as members of the board.

Two other violators appeared before the board last night. They were Lois Piercy, elementary education major from Springfield, who was charged with insubordination and not wearing full customs, and Stephen Ott, from Westfield, N.J., who was charged with failure to curtsy during turnout day.

Miss Piercy was requested to interview 10 or 15 freshman women outside of her residence hall and compile a constructive critique of the current customs program with suggestions for next year. Ott was acquitted.

Marbut Observes Press in Europe

By LYNN WARD

Dr. Frederick B. Marbut, professor of journalism, toured Europe last semester on sabbatical leave from the University, observing the press-government relations of the European newspapers compared to those of the United States.

In London Dr. Marbut particularly studied the English newspapers' treatment of the Lucy case in Alabama and the Life magazine article on John Foster Dulles, Secretary of State. According to Dr. Marbut the mor. "sensational" papers in England such as the "Herald," the "Daily Express," and the "Sketch" played up the Lucy story emotionally with considerable slant on how very serious the South's segregation problem is.

Times Tells Different Story

The more conservative papers such as the "London Times" displayed a considerably different attitude. The Times pointed out that there are African girls attending English Universities with no racial mob outbreaks. The "Manchester Guardian" claimed that the Supreme Court's decision on segregation was a "mistake."

In France, Dr. Marbut relates, the newspapers provide training programs for aspiring journalists as the universities offer no journalism curriculum. Dr. Marbut acted as an unofficial advisor to the United States delegates to the International Conference on Training of Journalists sponsored by the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization which met in France.

Marbut Visits Galleries

In Italy Dr. Marbut gained admission to the press galleries of the Italian Parliament and was able to compare them to the press galleries of the Congress of the United States. Of particular interest in Italian papers is their page completely devoted to literary and cultural material, generally done by free lance writers.

This page is the closest most Italian newspapers come to having an editorial page.

From conversations with several editors of Italian newspapers, Dr. Marbut learned that while Italy has a "free press" some caution is used when printing long political articles.
