Employers Set High Standards

By CAROLE GIBSON

The average company spends $15,000 to train college graduates before they can fit into its operation.

This makes the personnel staff extremely selective in screening applicants, because it can not afford to waste money on an employee, who will have to be dismissed before he is able to produce, according to George N. P. Leetch, director of the University Placement Service.

In estimating a graduate's potential productivity, employers have told University Placement Service officials that they evaluate specific factors which they evaluate as an indication of future success.

The record a student has made during his college career consists of grades, activities, and any short work experience. Grades are generally looked upon as an indication of how well a job has been completed, they say.
