Farming Dangerous Business University Survey Reveals

Farming is a dangerous business. According to a survey of 2246 Pennsylvania farm operators, farming is nearly four times as hazardous as all industrial occupations.

The survey was made by Dr. William G. Mather of the agricultural experiment station, and Prodipto Roy, graduate student in rural sociology from India.

Farm workers in the survey averaged 31.13 non-fatal accidents per million man-hours of work during the year, while the average for all industries was 7.22.

Dr. Mather said that the industrial figures are based on payroll hours, and the farm figures on man-work units devised by agricultural economists.

The study showed that the size of the farm was related to the number of accidents, with small farms having a higher accident rate.

Small farms had 110.1 non-fatal accidents per million man-hours, while the accident rate gradually fell off as the size of the farm increased, with the biggest farms averaging 18.8 non-fatal accidents per million man-hours.

On a monthly breakdown, January and November had the highest accident rate, each with 10.8 per cent of the total number of accidents for the year, and May had the lowest accident rate.

According to the type of farm, fruit and vegetables farms had the highest accident rate. Dairy farms also had a high accident rate.

General farming had the lowest accident rate.

The survey was the most extensive ever made of farm and home accidents in Pennsylvania, Dr. Mather said.
