Jack Wimmer says —
Boys, time is getting short for snow treads and anti-freeze. Being a little early doesn't hurt a bit so stop in now.

This is the first time in history that American painting has set the pace to this extent, he said. The center of their activity is New York, but some of the influential younger painters now live in other sections of the country.

Universities Are Influential
Many of the outstanding young painters, Dr. Christ-Janer said, come out of American universities, which are becoming more and more influential in the development of artistic talent.

Dr. Christ-Janer illustrated his talk with examples of the work

Dr. Albert Christ-Janer, School of the Arts director of American artists. He included among the "old masters" who have influenced the new school of American artists such painters as Paul Burlin, Stewart Davis, Sigmund Menkes, Adolf Gottlieb and Hans Hoffman.

Among newer American painters, he showed the works of Cajori, Congdon, Kaceri, Kerkam, Afro and Mathieu.

Cites Other Works

These men, like most others of their school, are abstractionists or non-objectivists, he said. But this is not the only school of modern painting, he added, citing such naturalistic works as those of Katzman and Rivers.

A painting, Dr. Christ-Janer explained, should portray an idea and reveal a mood, and it should be judged on the basis of how well it does these things.

Quoting Andre Malraux, he said that the aim of the modern artist is to subdue all things to his style, whether or not he depicts objects in his work. The artist, he said, is a creator, not a delineator.
