University Scientists Study Cancer Growths in Plants

University scientists are working to better the understanding of the growth of cancer cells through current studies of "crown gall," a cancer-like growth in tomatoes, roses, and other plants.

They hope that their findings can be applied to cancerous growth in animals and human beings.

The Pennsylvania Division of the American Cancer Society has granted $3600 for the first year's research in the department of botany and plant pathology.

Plant pathologists Dr. Houston B. Couch, Dr. Richard D. Schein and Dr. Harry C. Fink are conducting the project with Dr. Couch as leader. Miss Elizabeth Woods, a Wellesley botany graduate, is technician.

Trace Tumor Growth

Dr. Couch and his associates are interested in tracing tumor growth from the first abnormal cell. Although much has been done on the crown gall disease itself, little is known of this abnormal growth.

Before this phase can be tackled, the researchers find it necessary to thoroughly study the normal anatomy of the tomato plant. They will determine the origin of various tissue groups in the stem.

To Inoculate Plants

Armed with this information, Dr. Couch reports, the team will be ready to study the development of the abnormal tumors. This will be done by inoculating plants with the causal bacteria to stimulate tumor growth.

An involved study of the growth and development of cancer cells will proceed. Comparisons will be made to the normal development.
