

30 Students Accept Clinic Help For Speech-Hearing Problems

By CAROLE GIBSON

Thirty of the 141 students found to have speech and hearing difficulties decided to accept help from the Speech and Hearing Clinic this semester.

About 3475 new students were tested by the clinic, according to Dr. James V. Frick, associate professor of speech. The test was given to all freshmen and transfer students.

Frick said that past surveys showed one per cent of the total number tested, about 25 per cent of those to whom help was recommended, actually followed through with the clinic program. Approximately 20 per cent of those who began the program quit before they had completed it.

No Charge
No fee is charged for any help given to students by the clinic, and any student who feels he needs help is eligible to come.

Frick said that the clinic tries to help as many students as possible each semester, but that sometimes it is forced to give preference to those needing good speech or hearing to enter their chosen profession.

Frick explained that the students referred to the clinic fall into three categories; those with foreign language difficulties, who are recommended to take Speech 115; those with minor speech defects, who are recommended to take a three credit course, Speech 205; and those needing more specialized attention, who come directly to the clinic for help.

The last group spends between one and one-half to two hours a week in the clinic, and comprises about 25 per cent of the total number recommended to receive help.

Helped on Individual Basis
Most of those who work directly with the clinic are helped on an individual basis, but some of them receive a combination of group and individual help.

The majority of those in the third group have either an articulation or stuttering problem. A less frequent difficulty is a voice that is deviant in pitch, loudness, or quality.

Progress Requires Study
Frick said that individual progress will not result unless the students are faithful in doing the assignments and exercises they are asked to do outside of the clinic.

He said that the clinic will work with students who have speech problems as long as their problem remains, but that the majority of those who come for help are able to correct their difficulties in one semester.

In comparison to those students found to have speech problems the number found with hearing problems is small. Most of these students have a certain degree of hearing loss, but few are found with a large enough hearing loss to be seriously handicapped.

Often students who are discovered to have a hearing loss are asked to come to the clinic for lip reading or speech therapy. The reason for their taking speech therapy is that their difficulty in hearing other speakers may have hindered their own speech in developing as it should have.

Percentage Consistent
Frick said that the number of students needing help each year was always about the same percentage of the enrollment and that the percentage of students needing help at the University was about the same as at all other universities.

He added that the clinic was trying to make plans to expand its facilities as the total enrollment expands.

Board Cheaper Way Back

Traffic Court Fines Eleven

Traffic Court fined 11 persons a total of $47 Monday evening.

Thirty dollars was collected for the chief offense, failure to register vehicles.

Six students who did not appear before the court were automatically fined a total of $22. Traffic and parking violations amounted to $15 in fines while failure to report to the Campus Patrol office resulted in a $2 fine.

Two violations were dismissed and fines amounting to $21 were suspended.

Richard Kurtz, court chairman, warned that service drives, reserved spots, or areas which are lined in yellow are not open for night parking. Anyone who parks in these spots will receive a ticket, he said.
