

University to Form Policy on Parking

Calvin G. Reen, director of the campus traffic survey, said last night that the University administration will make necessary policy decisions, such as possible further bans on student cars, after the survey report is submitted.

However, Reen, professor of civil engineering, said the University may have sufficient funds to improve existing facilities so that increased restriction may not be necessary.

The report will only make recommendations of a physical nature upon evaluation of the data gathered by the survey, he said.

The recommendations may include such things as specifications for walks and driveways.

Reen said the report will definitely advocate the continuance of checks on the traffic situation. These would serve to keep the program up to date and provide for evaluation of any changes made.

After the survey data is tabulated, it will be possible to estimate the number of parking spaces required when the student population reaches the predicted 20,000, he said.

The report will also indicate the utilization being made of existing parking facilities.

The survey began three weeks ago with aerial photographs of campus parking facilities. These were taken at one hour intervals throughout the day.

The photographs enabled the tabulators to count the number of cars parked in every area at each hour of the day, Reen said. They also show how quickly available spaces filled and how many cars were waiting for a spot.

Reen said a University of Michigan surveyor, studying the traffic conditions there, came to the conclusion that "campuses of the future will consist of a parking lot with buildings and trees placed so as not to interfere with traffic."

He said the vehicle and pedestrian count will tentatively be held the week of May 13-17.
