Carnival Sidelights

By DAVE FINEMAN

They had to fight to do it, but the youngsters managed to match the numbers of students who crowded onto the ferris wheel, the "flying saucer" and the other amusements at Spring Week Carnival last night.

The made-to-order night and the general gaiety drove students onto the various rides, and they screamed and enjoyed themselves just as much as the younger crowd.

The midway was gay, but the people were just as much fun to watch.

A graduate student and his wife fought their greatest marital battle as they chewed to the center of a foot-long hot dog in a novel race. But neither was concerned with winning for long—they soon found their blouse fronts covered with oozing mustard.

A too-heavy drain on electric power facilities threatened at one time to curtail some of the carnival's activities. But cooperation between shows and carnival officials remedied the situation. Many lights judged to be unnecessary were turned off to save the night from more drastic measures.

One carnival goer found ten minutes of pleasure in watching one of his professors, whom he called the "terror of the economics department," taking his children one-by-one for rides on the ferris wheel. Some people find fun in the oddest things.

No one has figured out yet why someone in a straw hat bearing the official blue committee ribbon was darting in and out of carnival shows. Was he really locking into a report of impriety?

was very pleased with the entire carnival, according to Robert Krakoff, Spring Week chairman. He said the groups all pitched in and provided "a lot of fine entertainment."

Three campus patrolmen and one Borough policeman were on hand at the carnival grounds to regulate traffic and watch over the carnival scene.

Three groups, Zeta Beta Tau, Sigma Tau Gamma, and Sigma Nu and Alpha Tau Omega, who had originally entered the carnival, did not construct booths or produce shows at the carnival.

Several small power failures caused shows to be stopped for a short time, but power was generally restored quickly enough to keep an interested audience.

Fraternities, sororities and independent groups displayed endless ingenuity in their construction of booths. Displays, all the way from castle fronts to time machines, decorated the bright, colorful midway.

Dancing bare-legged girls and three or four piece jazz bands seemed to attract the greatest crowds on the outside. Congestions occurred sporadically when shows were over and groups of spectators attempted to enter and leave the show booths at the same time.

As the evening got cooler the concessions selling hot foods were thronged with children, show characters and carnival-goers.

Microphones and public address systems, records, shouting barkers and singing groups provided the festive noise for the evening. The roving crowds added to it with their shouts of approval.
