Role of Religion-

(Continued from page two) As for religious institutions, Archbishop Temple once summed up their obligation by saying it was "the business of Lambeth (the Archbishop's Palace) to remind Westminster (Parliament) of its responsibility to God."

If the Judeo-Christian religions can be true, it is a part of that truth that they will not fully win out in the world until the end of time. Meanwhile, religious thought and institutions share the imperfections and take part in the struggles as we see them.

The religious mind is tradtionally more at home in the realm of brotherhood, a new sense of life's frailty and death's shape, suffering and pride than with the calculations of military command or government.

- While there is, happily, no official institution in the United States to remind Congress of its responsibilities to God, the religious minds of our country, at their wisest, well prepared for the tragedy sure to come, are nevertheless disposed to exert more influence in the "secular order" than they have in the past.
