

Archaeologist Will Head Liberal Arts Research

Dr. Frederick R. Matson, professor of archaeology has been named assistant dean for research in the College of the Liberal Arts and also director of the Social Science Research Center.

He will continue as professor of archaeology.

The position of assistant dean for research is a new post. The Social Science Research Center was established in 1952 to encourage research in the social sciences, co-ordinate the research interests of the members of the faculty and staff, assist in obtaining financial support for research, and facilitate the widest possible publication, dissemination use and application of its discoveries and conclusions.

Dr. Matson was appointed to the University faculty in 1948 as professor of ceramics and in 1953 was named professor of archaeology. Previously, he was head of the glass section research laboratories of the Armstrong Cork Co., Lancaster, for four years and was an assistant ceramic engineer working on optical glass with the National Bureau of Standards, Washington, D.C.

Dr. Matson served from 1936 to 1942 with the University of Michigan as a field archaeologist in Iraq, as a research assistant in ceramic archaeology and as assistant curator of ceramics.

In 1955, Dr. Matson served as a field associate with the Iraq-Jarmo expedition sent into the field by the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago. He uses his experience in the field of ceramics and archaeology in the application of modern ceramic technology to the study of the ancient ceramic products of pottery and glass. They are about the best preserved things left to man from ancient civilizations.

Dr. Matson is a graduate of the University of Illinois with a bachelor of science degree in ceramic engineering. He received his master of arts in anthropology and his doctor of philosophy in ceramic archaeology, both from the University of Michigan.

Customs--

proof of it, the customs board has reminded freshmen to carry copies of their schedules at all times. Upperclassmen may request to see the schedules when they stop the dink and name card bearers.

As usual, the Mall was the most popular site for singing and cheering crowds yesterday, and the steps of Schwab Auditorium were well populated with off-key singers between classes.

Several upperclassmen have remarked that the Freshman Oath is a "vulnerable spot" for many freshmen. While many frosh do not know the oath by heart, probably twice as many upperclassmen are unfamiliar with it.

The oath is:

"In furthering the traditions of Penn State, I hereby promise to memorize our school songs and cheers wear my dink and name card with pride, and learn the names and places of traditional interest. All of this I do for the betterment of the Pennsylvania State University."

Veterans and freshmen over 21 should carry matriculation cards during customs as a means of identification. These students are exempt from freshman customs.

The Freshman Customs Board will meet at 6:30 tonight in 217 HUB to hear and penalize customs violators.
