

Calendar Changes

Summer Term Would Require No Regular Semester Changes

Last of a Series

Any plan for a 12-month calendar would obviously involve the use of the summer months.

Therefore, the last article in this series will discuss the proposal for adding an 11-week summer term without changing the two regular semesters.

Such a proposed summer session would offer most of the regular-sequence courses given during the regular year. Thus, as in the other two proposed plans, a student could graduate in three or three and a half years.

The two main stumbling blocks in this plan are the difficulty in getting students to enroll for the summer and the administrative and instructional problems involved in condensing 16 weeks of study into 11 weeks.

There are, however, certain advantages to attending a regular summer session which may encourage students to do so:

•The prospect of graduating in three or three and a half years.

•The offering of in-sequence regular courses during the summer.

•A move in the state's high schools which may accustom students to the idea.

Three answers have been proposed for the problem of condensing the course work into 11 weeks:

•Present summer session courses be reorganized for presentation in 50 minutes, with more meetings a week.

•Some classes be released while others are still in progress.

•All courses taught be reorganized for presentation in 60 minutes.

Some of the advantages to students which have been listed are:

•No changes in the present semester system are required.

•Time would be provided for up to four weeks' vacation for students needing time off for relief from continuous study or for part-time jobs.

•Eleven weeks, better than the present short summer sessions, would allow enough time for the significance of ideas to be assimilated.

A comparison between the class schedule for a regular semester and for a 10- or 11-week summer session shows an odd arrangement of classes.

If a course meets once a week under the semester system, it would meet once each week plus once each alternate week in the summer; if twice a week, then it would meet three times a week in the summer; if three times a week, then four times a week plus once each alternate week and if four times a week, then it would meet 6 times a week in a summer session.
