BusAd Moves from 'Slums' Into Modern Boucke Building

By JEFF POLLACK

"I'm not going to work in that slum" was about all the young professor could say when he first laid eyes on his new quarters.

Leon Quinto, former assistant professor of economics, now with the International Business Machine Corporation, was filled with a feeling of extreme trepidation as he gazed at Moffat Cottage, then quarters for a good deal of the faculty of the College of Business Administration.

Quinto probably wouldn't be quite so disgruntled now that business administration has moved to new quarters.

Moffat Cottage is situated immediately to the north of Sparks.

Before the move to Boucke last summer there wasn't too much one could say about the Business Administration quarters—mainly because there weren't very many quarters.

Even with the use of Moffat, space was at a premium. In some cases eight professors shared one office—some even sharing desks.

Moffat, which was originally a private house, wasn't altered much when Business Administration took over. One staff member remembers being assigned to an office on the second floor of the cottage—the room, originally a bedroom, "still had pink wallpaper."

Until the completion of the new quarters, students also suffered. Only one statistical laboratory was available. With the new facilities available, students can be assured that it will be possible for them to complete the courses required for graduation.

David H. McKinley, assistant dean of the college, although extremely happy over the new move, does miss one aspect of the cramped quarters.

"I always knew what was going on," he said, "the place was like Grand Central Station." Now in his new-found privacy he "misses the hubbub."

Graduate assistants have also benefited from the move. They had been confined to a basement without the use of a telephone. They now each have a private cubicle on the second floor of Boucke.
