

State Trout Season Kicks Off To Very Slow Start in County

Story and Pictures by GEORGE HARRISON

Opening day of trout season is usually a pretty sad day for fishing worms, but most of the worms in Centre County were safe yesterday as angling got off to a slow start.

Throughout the day the local streams were lined with anglers of all ages including many University students. The story seemed to be the same everywhere. "They just aren't biting today."

According to County Fish Warden David Dahlgren of Philipsburg, the light catch yesterday was due to the cold and high water, although he said that this year's stocking is not up to par. He reported that the entire length of Spring Creek had been stocked including the area around Rockview Penitentiary, where many of the University students tried their luck.

Officials at the fish hatchery at Pleasant Gap released the following figures of the numbers of trout stocked in local streams: Spring Creek, 2570; Penn's Creek, 2880; Logan Branch, 660; Elk Creek, 910, and Bald Eagle, 5890. These figures include all three species of trout: brown, brook, and rainbow. They ranged from six to 14 inches in length.

Warden Dahlgren said in-season stocking will begin very soon. He said that in some creeks more trout will be stocked during the season than in the pre-season stocking.

Worms seemed to be the favored lure, although some anglers used flies, salmon eggs and minnows. One lucky fisherman with three trout in his creel called salmon eggs his best bait.

Another fisherman stated that in his 22 years of fishing in state streams yesterday was his worst day.

In Pennsylvania, each fisherman is allowed a limit of eight trout per day. He is only allowed to keep trout that are six inches or more in length.

In addition to trout, many fishermen reported that they were catching a number of suckers.

Penn's Creek is in the national spotlight as featured in the April 7 issue of Sports Illustrated. The magazine tags the stream as one of the three relatively unknown streams which are dream havens for the fly-casting trout fisherman.

The author declares that Penn's Creek is rated by a few experts that know it as "the best fly-rod trout water in the East." He states that the creek has brown and rainbow trout up to seven pounds and "possibly twice that throughout its more than 40 miles of trout water." The stream emerges from Penn's Cave near Bellefonte.

The price of a fishing license in Pennsylvania is $3.25. The trout season lasts until Sept. 1.

Will Shows Causes Of Schizophrenia

By NEAL FRIEDMAN

Using a series of case histories, Dr. Otto A. Will Jr., director of psychotherapy at Chestnut Lodge, Rockville, Md., showed how a lack of human relatedness and a subsequent withdrawal from the world leads to the development of schizophrenia, one of the most serious of mental diseases.

Will spoke on "Human Relatedness and Schizophrenic Reaction" as a part of the Graduate School Lecture Series Monday night. "Schizophrenia," he said, "derives from a distortion of human relations and an inability to find a relatedness (to others). The essence of therapy lies in the forming of ties."

However, Will said the forming of human ties, although helpful, may often cause the patient to become worse. He cited the case of "Tom," an accountant who insisted that demons were trying to poison him with gasses. He soon became attached to one of the nurses and appeared to be recovering. When the nurse was forced to leave the hospital to take another position Tom pleaded with her to stay. He said he would die if she left. The nurse left and Tom died.

Will said in this case the patient had achieved some measure of relatedness but with only one person. When this person left him he again withdrew from the world.

Many persons suffering schizophrenia die, as Tom did, without any apparent medical cause. On the other hand, emotional stresses such as schizophrenia may cause disease. Will said many cancer patients suffer schizophrenia. However, he said this is not believed to be a cause of cancer.

Despite the fact that schizophrenic reactions may appear repulsive to the average individual, Will said he had never seen a schizophrenic reaction which was not exhibited in a normal person to a lesser degree.

Will attributed the repulsion which schizophrenia brings about to the scarcity of patients who are rehabilitated. He told of "Evelyn" a strong and assertive woman who often sat naked amid her own filth. Whenever anyone approached her she fought them off. When Will approached her and she tried to fight him off he resisted and her attacks ceased.

These people, said Will, have isolated themselves and as a result experience difficulty in human relations. Once the vacuum they have created around themselves is broken, they are on their way to recovery.

Zoller Named To Program On Adult Ed

Edwin W. Zoller, professor of art, has been named to the University instructional team which will concern itself with an extensive program of liberal education for Pennsylvania adults.

The 5-year program starting July 1 will operate with financial assistance from the fund for Adult Education. It will try to develop liberal adult education programs by working with local groups and organizations.

Zoller, who will specialize in the arts, is the second of four persons to be named to the instructional team. Lawrence E. Dennis, vice president for academic affairs, deemed Zoller well fitted for the assignment because of his background as a teacher and lecturer in the arts at the University undergraduate centers in DuBois and Altoona.

He has lectured widely on Italian Renaissance painting, and has exhibited his own work in Paris, New York City, Pittsburgh and smaller communities in the state. Zoller joined the extension division in 1927 and transferred to the campus in 1956.
