UBA Book Sale Ends at 12 Today

Today is the last day to buy books at the Used Book Agency, which has grossed about $32,500, so far, slightly less than last year.

The UBA will be open from 9 a.m. to noon today and will refund money on wrong books which have been purchased until that time.

The UBA operates at a loss. Students receive all but 20 cents back on each book. The money refunded this year will be about $21,620.

Profit made on the sale of dinks in the Book Exchange is used to make up the deficit. The numerous changes in text books and editions are responsible for this year's decline in sales, BX Board of Control Chairman James Meister said. One professor even changed the book required for his course to an earlier edition, Meister said.

The activities calendars given to students at registration were supplied from profits made in previous years by the BX. At the All-University Cabinet meeting Thursday night, George L. Donovan, coordinator of student activities, and the BX were commended on the production of the calendar. Extra copies are available at the BX.

Starting Monday, a 50-cent refund will be made to students who turn in receipts of $5 or more at the BX.

From September 29 to October 20 the UBA will return money from books sold. Receipts from the books must be shown.

Women Get Receipts From Gym Suit Sale

All junior and senior women who sold gym suits through the Cwen's gym suit sale can collect the money for the suits Tuesday by bringing their white receipt slips to the Redifer mail room between 8 and 7 p.m.

If the receipts are not presented at this time, the money becomes the property of Cwens, sophomore women's hat society.

Anglers May Have to Cut Big Catches

You may have to throw larger fish back into the creek in the future according to James McFadden, a fisherman for 20 years and a member of a graduate class in zoology specializing in fish research.

He said that steps should be taken to study the laws on the legal size of fish if they are to have any meaning.

McFadden, who is a candidate for a doctor of philosophy degree in zoology, has done extensive research in Wisconsin on brook trout and is currently conducting a similar study in Pennsylvania.

He said that beside the laws protecting the small fish, some regulations should be passed protecting the spawners that must repopulate the stream.

He pointed out the factors which have an effect on the fish population: weather and stream conditions, and natural controls.

McFadden also noted that the percentage of small fish to large fish decreases as the number of the large fish increases. He said that because of the natural stabilization, there is usually no warning when a fish population is heading for extinction.

He said that maintaining a minimum length regulation that protects the brood stock for at least one spawning season would be helpful, but that regulation on bag limits on the fish mean little, as few fishermen take home a maximum catch.

Spruce Creek is one of the waterways being studied by McFadden's class.

Civil Eng Camp To Accomodate 100 Children

More than 100 central Pennsylvania school children of the fifth and sixth grades will be going to school-camp during the next three weeks at the University's 450-acre civil engineering camp in Stone Valley.

The program is sponsored by the Department of Education and the College of Physical Education.

Students in elementary education and in recreation education work with University faculty members and teachers of the participating schools in conducting the 5-day program for each school.

Fred M. Coombs, in charge of the recreation education curriculum, said the children find the camp an experience in communal living in an environment totally work, social growth, and spiritual different from that of the more formal classroom.

The camp was started three years ago by the University in cooperation with the Pennsylvania School Study Council.
