

Cat Week To Begin Tomorrow

By JANET DURSTINE

If your pussycat insists on using your favorite chair, or drops the mouse he has just caught on the livingroom rug, or makes a few scratches on your most treasured Chippendale, don't get angry—next week.

Next week is his week. Tomorrow begins "Cat Week - International."

The cat has jumped from 12th to second place in priority as a pet.

Twenty-one million furry felines now inhabit American homes—an average of 1.2 cats per family.

Working against anti-cat prejudices of perhaps eight centuries, the little mammal has come a long way since the days when an indifferent and ignorant public inflicted numerous acts of cruelty on it.

The cat has elevated his social status from that of a "pest" to that of a positive contributor to modern civilization.

Besides catching those rascally little rodents, the cat has a number of other uses.

These include serving as a witches' companion on Halloween, crossing the paths of unfortunate persons (only black cats serve these two functions), keeping feet warm on a winter night and putting presumptuous dogs in their place.

Child psychologists even claim that homes with cats rarely turn out juvenile delinquents.

Letter--

(Continued from page four) quality and content of the direction that went into the show? In this writer's opinion, Warren Smith is a director who both understands Shaw and has the theatrical sense to put him across to the audience—both of which tasks are quite difficult.

And finally, while a critic certainly has the privilege to comment upon individual performances, I feel that I have the privilege to disagree with these comments.
