Spanish Major Doubles As Collegian Typesetter

By LOLLIE-NEUBARTH

If you have a hard time fitting study hours in between such essential pastimes as eating, sleeping, Hubbing and going to a few classes a day, you'll be a little incredulous and perhaps a bit uneasy as you read about Joe Kubica.

Here is a typical Friday for this third semester language major. He wakes at 9 a.m. after about five hours of sleep, attends classes from 10 to 5 with a break for lunch and study, grabs a sandwich and reports for work at the Centre Daily Times at 5:30.

There he remains until 2 a.m. or later helping to get the Collegian printed and off the presses in time for you to read it.

An extraordinary capacity for learning brought Joe to the University 12 years after his graduation from Altoona High School. After working for the Pennsylvania Railroad and as a magazine binder, he began a career in journalism by answering an ad for a city editor on a small weekly newspaper.

However, Joe left editing to learn the printing trade when he discovered the men setting type were earning more than he was.

One of the most fascinating skills of a printer is his ability to read metal type which is set in reverse. After a while, Joe said, a printer can read backwards just as well as forwards.

"As a matter of fact," he laughed, "I had a whole set of dictionaries placed backwards on a shelf and never noticed it until a visiting friend pointed it out."

In addition to regular college studies, he is completing a correspondence course in printing, necessary for journeyman status. According to Joe, the lessons on grammar in the course are even more difficult than those administered by the University.

Joe hopes to teach college courses after taking graduate work in Spanish. He is also studying Russian and Italian.

When not working or studying, Joe manages to get a little extra reading done in his "spare" time. How much? Only about one book a week. What type of books? Non-fiction mostly, he admitted.

Somehow, Joe also finds time to help classmates with their work whenever they ask. And if you're wondering what kind of grades he can possibly get, Joe managed to squeeze through last semester with a 3.54 grade point average.

Starting to think you could have spent a few more minutes studying last night before starting a bridge game? Well, don't let it bother you. Stop in at the HUB and listen to the Chipmunk Song a few times—you'll forget about classes before you know it.

DOC Provides Job Information In Old Main

Students desiring information about job opportunities and/or requirements need go only as far as the fourth floor of Old Main to find it.

There, in the Division of Counseling occupational information library, is a storehouse of facts which provides information ranging from graduate schools to job opportunities for college graduates.

This library has been set up, according to Dr. Donald Ford, director of the Division of Counseling, "to provide a factual base for student consideration of career plans."

In it are three filing cabinets filled with pamphlets sent out by firms employing college graduates, which state the requirements for filling positions with those firms, and bulletins and pamphlets issued by the Department of Labor.

The latter contain information on a broad scope about the current outlook in almost every occupational field.

There are also volumes dealing with the nation's colleges and universities and the courses they offer for those students interested in transferring.

Ford said that much work goes into keeping the files, known as the Occupational Information Reference File, or OIRF, as up to date as possible in order to afford the greatest advantages to the students using them.

The library is open daily, Ford said, and there is always someone available to help the student find what he is looking for.

In charge of the library at the present time is Floyd Engstrom, a recently discharged army officer working for his doctor's degree.

Leadership Course to End Tonight

Members of the leadership training class will write a paper on the course at 7 p.m. tonight in 119 Osmond.

This will be the group's last meeting. James Elliott, chairman, said about 200 to 250 persons would complete the course. About 325 persons registered for the classes.

Plaques will be given to all who complete the course.

Classes began Oct. 22. They included:

Talks by Jay Feldstein, All-University president, and Wilmer E. Kenworthy, director of student affairs, on student and administrative government at the University.

Talks on leadership characteristics by Dr. Earl P. Strong, professor of management, on parliamentary procedure by Dr. Harold J. O'Brien, associate professor of speech, and on public relations by Dr. Ralph H. Wherry, professor of insurance.

A discussion of campus activities, including hat societies, advisory boards, political parties, Women's Student Government Association, student councils and the Cabinet personnel interviewing committee.

A "red tape special," including talks by George L. Donovan, manager of associated student activities, on Hetzel Union Building facilities and scheduling rooms for classes, and on The Daily Collegian, WMAJ, WDFM and Central Purchasing Agency by representatives of these activities.

The course will be given again next semester.

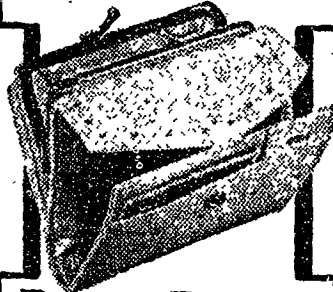

Fellowship Applications Available for Seniors

Applications for the four fellowships offered to seniors interested in graduate study in the College of Engineering and Architecture are available in 204 Sackett.

The stipends vary from $1200 to $1800 and recipients of these fellowships are exempt from general fees and the out-of-state tuition fee.

Applicants must meet all requirements for admission to the Graduate School.

UCA to Sponsor Annual Carol Sing

Students can get in the "Christmas spirit" tomorrow night by participating in the annual University carol sing on the front steps of Old Main.

The sing, sponsored by the University Christian Association, will begin at 7:30 under the direction of James Beach, instructor in music. Master of ceremonies for the event is Thomas Daubert, senior in chemical engineering from Tamaqua. The Rev. Donald Cutler, Episcopal student pastor, will speak.

After the sing the UCA will sponsor a party for all students in the Helen Eakin Eisenhower chapel.
