Arnold Air Society Encourages Debating

The University's Arnold Air Society is engaged in a plan to encourage the formation of debating teams to aid in the training of officers, according to Capt. Norman M. Winter, assistant professor of Air Science.

Capt. Winter, adviser to the society, said that the project is in its early stages and at present "our main interest is to get as many members of the Arnold Air Society interested as possible."

The society, a national organization, is an honorary fraternity of cadets enrolled in the Air Force ROTC program.

The idea for the debate teams came up at a December meeting of the society's Pennsylvania Squadron Commanders. Plans were then made to form debate teams and have a tournament.

On Feb. 3 four members of the University's debate team staged a sample debate for the cadets. "It was an attempt to generate enthusiasm for debate since none of our members are on the varsity team," Winter said.

The University's cadet debaters won the first round of the tournament held at Duquesne University Feb. 28 when they defeated cadets from Duquesne and the University of Pittsburgh. The topic was: "Resolved that the United States should adopt a policy of unification of the Armed Forces."

The tournament could not be completed, however, because of weather conditions and other difficulties.
