LA Program For Math-Sci Remains Same

The faculty of the College of the Liberal Arts yesterday wrapped up a year of debate on proposed changes for the mathematics-science requirements by voting to retain the present program with the addition of astronomy to the group of physical sciences.

The motion, which had been tabled at last month's meeting, was passed with no additional discussion.

Until now astronomy 90, a non-mathematical presentation of the principles of astronomy, has not been acceptable toward fulfillment of the laboratory science requirement.

Action to revise the program began last May when the faculty defeated a committee recommendation to raise the credits required from 12 to 15, and approved a motion that Mathematics 2, 6 and 14 would no longer be acceptable toward fulfillment of the college requirements.

A subsequent plan to require at least six credits in either physics or chemistry and three credits in the biological sciences was defeated.
