Buildings In Atomic War Discussed

Nuclear survival requires strong buildings and good shelter and our architects and engineers must be trained to plan and build accordingly, said Gifford H. Albright, assistant professor of architectural engineering.

He enumerated several special conditions of atomic war which engineers must consider: lateral resistance of structures to withstand blasts; radiation-shielding effectiveness of building materials; and the necessity for a "14-day artificial environment in shelter" while outside radiation levels are high.

Far from requiring special building in all instances, architects and engineers can plan against atomic attack "at little or no additional expense," Albright said.

"There are many requirements for functional space which lend themselves to effective shelter—if planned, designed, and constructed with this objective," he said.

But he emphasized that "the convertible shelter must be planned as an integral part of the building. It cannot be 'hung on' or rattached."

It is the responsibility of architecture and engineering educators to see that today's students have "a fundamental understanding of protection requirements," Albright said. They "must be leaders in education and research in nuclear defense matters."
