Summer Sessions Viewed in Library

By CATHY BELL

Fifty years of summer sessions history are currently being reviewed in the new display at the Pattee Library.

The display, set up by Mrs. Ridge Riley, was taken from the collection in the Penn State Room and consists of eight showcases of photographs, posters, catalogs and circulars.

Covering the sessions in six 10-year divisions, the display depicts the different areas covered by summer courses, some of which date back to 1897.

The display begins with a case illustrating the first summer courses at the University and the passing of the bill which made it possible for Penn State to open its facilities to accommodate summer session students on a regular basis. The idea was included in the program of Edwin Earle Sparks, president of the University at that time.

Also included is an account of the College's first European Seminar, conducted by Carl Fehr, German professor.

The second case, dealing with the 1920's, contains poster advertising summer courses, directories, and a number of early publications, one of which describes such activities as an open air theater. This case also contains a photograph of the entire summer enrollment of the college.

Victory gardens and physical fitness classes dominate the third period, that from 1911 to the time of World War I. Here the students, mostly girls, are shown being trained in gymnastic classes, caring for gardens, and helping America's forces in various other ways. This case also displays the first issue of the Summer Collegian published in 1915.

New and different schools and institutes were introduced in the 1930's, according to the third case which features such activities as a French Institute, a painting course, and a Library Technique School. Included are accounts of tours, hikes, and other recreational and educational functions.

The Summer Collegian, with marked differences, is also shown in the 1940 cases. This case also provides bulletins and catalogs, which point out the different steps used in shaping the current summer session program.

The final phases in bringing summer courses to their present point is brought out in the last case. Here, the program is brought up to the present-day standards, depicting the various methods used to operate the summer session.

Four other displays also follow the history of the University and feature recreational and special facilities dealing with such functions as hikes, tours, and picnics; and including various world affairs, traffic safety, linguistics instruction and nature study conferences.
