BU Locker Room Happy Stiff Defenses Cause Despite Loss to Lions Close Tilts In IM Grid

By JOHNNY BLACK Assistant Sports Editor

Paul Cancro, diminutive 5-8, 170-pound Boston University halfback, walked out of the shower displaying three red welts on his forehead as a result of his headfirst collision with Galen Hall, as he stopped the Penn State quarterback from entering paydirt on a fourth-down, second-quarter play. But the earto-ear gun on his face indicated; long, cool draws on a giant coke 'A jovial atmosphere prevailed throughout the Boston University diessing room as a happy gangof football players shed their pads after the game on Beaver Field Saturday afternoon.

One could never have guessed that they had just lost a ball game. The usual gloom that hovers over a losing club's locker room was nowhere to be found. These boys were happy because they were proud of the showing they had just made against the 10th ranked team in the nation.

The scrappy Terriers, still smarting from the 34-0 lacing the Lions handed them before a regional television audience last year, made the oddsmakers blush last weekend when they trimmed the Lions' predicted four TD bulge to a meager rine points.

Twice the inspired Terriers withstood the Lions' charge on the 1-vaid line and offensively the small but quick BU backs sliced off considerable yardage with their driving spurts. Untimely penalties kept their statisfical totals from climbing higher. Like Rip Engle had prophesied "they're real scrappers."

But at the same time this satisfaction of the BU players is also indicative of the esteem in which the Lion gridders are currently held. "This is a tribute to Penn State," commented Engle "when a team loses by nine points and is happy over it."
