Bringing new knowledge to eager finger tips

Braille has opened up bright new worlds for thousands and thousands of blind persons. However, the difficulty of translating printed material into this complex "touch language" has limited the number and variety of publications.

To make more Braille material available, a method of transcribing the printed word into Braille automatically has been developed by IBM scientists in cooperation with the American Printing House for the Blind.

The text, in punched card form, is processed by a high-speed IBM electronic computer. The computer can translate a 300-page book into its equivalent Braille in less than an hour.

It takes all kinds of talents to develop computer systems that can handle complex jobs like this. Expanding computer applications at IBM have created opportunities in research, engineering, programming and manufacturing. Perhaps one of these IBM careers is the "future" you've been looking for.
