

'60 Series Opened By Poetess Moore

By JOANNE MARK

Marianne Moore, the first featured artist in the 1960-61 Artists' Series, entertained her audience Wednesday evening in Schwab not only with her famous poetry, but also with a surprising humor and informality.

Miss Moore, introduced by Dr. Henry Sams, head of the Department of English, as the "infallible editor of Dial Magazine and a memorable spokesman for the true, valuable and permanent," received a standing ovation from the audience when she appeared on the stage.

Before reading her poem "St. Jerome and the Lion" Miss Moore explained that her inspiration for it came from a drawing in Time magazine. "You can see I have very select resources," she commented.

Miss Moore, before reading her poem, "The Rescue of Carnegie Hall," explained that it was written to insure a proper tribute to Isaac Stern and his colleagues who fought to save New York's Carnegie Music Hall from ruin. Upon completing the reading of this piece, Miss Moore, said that almost ironically Stern was opening at the Music Hall Wednesday evening.

At a reception in the Players' Green Room following the performance Miss Moore said that she speaks "quite a little" to student groups.

"I found the audience tonight very appreciative, with much vitality and reciprocity," she said. "They seemed to get the point." She recalled one audience that stared at her like "Cigar Store Indians" during the entire performance.

(Continued from page four) frosh who are getting the annual fall rush by upperclassmen. One frosh burst into my room last weekend, eyes sparkling and breathlessly disclosed that she had a date with a fraternity man that night.

Since I'd been here for at least a hundred years, she wanted my learned advice on whether "Sigma Chee" was a "good frat." I hope her pronunciation of Greek terms improved a little before she went there.

But then, everything seems to improve as freshmen become upperclassmen. Their sneaks get dirtier, they stop going to breakfast, they start sleeping through classes, and pretty soon they're upperclassmen.
