Student Tells Story Of Ghana Summer

By LYNNE CEREFICE

At about 10:45 a.m. on an average work day in the new Republic of Ghana, one would probably do as the Ghanaians do and take time out for a "coconut break."

This is a common practice in the small villages of Northern Ghana, according to a University student who spent the summer in Ghana participating in a student manual labor program.

Lurene Jochem, senior in home economics from Pompton Lakes, N.J., said that the purpose of the program, dubbed "Operation Crossroads Africa," is "to build bridges of understanding" between the people of Africa and North America, by having Americans and Ghanaians work side by side in a series of manual labor projects.

Miss Jochem explained that students from various universities and colleges throughout the country may apply to participate in the work project plan in any African country of their choice.

Miss Jochem described the people of Ghana as "very friendly and helpful." The average Ghanaian woman is a skilled trader and competent merchant, she said. It is the woman's domestic responsibility to conduct the family trade in the open market places of native towns and cities.

The Ghanaians really "use their heads for something besides a hat rack," Miss Jochem said. She explained that they carry almost everything on their heads "even haystacks."

As far as dance steps go, the Ghanaians are one jump ahead of American youth. The "High-life," a popular native dance, is described by Miss Jochem as a combination of the American jitterbug and the new twist. "They love it," she said.

As part of a "self-help project" in a northern village, Miss Jochem helped to build a 3-room school house. Working hand in hand with 28 native Ghanaians, her student group took on all the chores of masons, mixing cement and laying bricks from shortly after dawn until the sun's heat forced retirement for the day.

The normal Ghanaian diet consists of such exotic concoctions as roast peanut stew, fermented corn, roast chicken (whole—a la feet and head) and roast ram.
