Levy Tries Tolerance in 1780's

By KAREN HYNCKEAL

Attempts to reduce racial and religious prejudices in rural Pennsylvania are not new. In the late eighteenth century for instance, one man, through an act of brotherhood, laid an important foundation for future generations to remember. When Aaron Levy, a seemingly insignificant Jew, saw this section of Pennsylvania in the 1780's, it was a forest of trees and woodland with scattered population.

Levy settled not far from what is now State College. (The town of Aaronsburg was named after him.) His first plans were to build a place of worship.

Strangely enough, however, Levy was not thinking of a synagogue.

Wishing to foster an atmosphere of complete religious freedom and understanding, Levy built the Salem Lutheran Church in 1799 and planned on a Reform church in addition.

Levy and his churches and his town were somewhat forgotten for 150 years. But in 1949, they came unexpectedly into the limelight.

It was at this time that Arthur Lewis, a representative of the Pennsylvania Department of Commerce, was traveling through Aaronsburg. Learning of its history, Lewis became vitally interested in the cause which Levy had tried to promote.

Lewis was so convinced of its worth that he started a program to recognize Levy.

The project grew and on Oct. 23, 1949 the opening service of this mass recognition began.

The citizens of Centre County staged a huge outdoor pageant, with over 1000 people participating in the commemoration.

In 1953, the Aaronsburg story was again remembered. One hundred leaders chosen from the fields of government, religion, labor and recreation came to Aaronsburg to participate in a conference.
