

Job View Looks Good For Grads

By SUE TAYLOR
The fact that so many employers are interested in University students is a real compliment to Penn State and its graduates, according to George N. P. Leetch, director of the Placement Service. Job interviews will be held here from Feb. 13 until May 9. Although the level of activity in some industries has dropped, there are still more than enough jobs available for the students who are graduating in June, he said. Leetch said that there has been a relative increase in requests for students graduating from the colleges of liberal arts and business administration. The demand for students from the colleges of engineering and of science has relatively decreased, he said. "Many companies are looking for graduates with a broad cultural area of study," Leetch explained. "Three out of eight college graduates hired by General Motors are non-engineers or non-scientists." "For the first couple years of his employment in many industries the college graduate is an investment," Leetch said. "Companies often spend $15,000 in the training of a graduate, hoping that in a few years he will be able to rise to a position of importance and responsibility." Leetch's advice to a student who is looking for a job is to prepare himself before the interview. "A student should analyze himself and the courses he has taken so he can determine in what field his interest and ability lies," Leetch said. "He should also familiarize himself with the company to which he is applying. "During an interview, the student tells the company representative about himself, the representative tells the student about the company, and they decide together if this company has the right opportunities for him," he said.
