

World War Brings Little Lion to State

By ELLIE HUMMER
During World War II, amid bullets, bombs and fighting, the "Little Lion" caricature was born.

This symbol of Penn State's prowess which regularly shouts or moans the outcome of a football game on Ridge Riley's "Football Letter" to the alumni, was the original idea of a well-known cartoonist who met a Centre County man, Bob Wilson, during the last war.

Wilson, who intended to start working for the sports staff of the Centre Daily Times after the war, saw the sketches by the cartoonist and brought them back with the hope of using them in the paper.

Although Wilson never actually used the sketches for their original purpose he gave them to Ridge Riley, alumni secretary, who wanted them for his "Football Letter." According to Riley, the idea caught on and many people started making their own sketches of the lion in various positions.

At the present, Riley has a huge collection of cartoons showing the lion in all degrees of happiness, disgust, chagrin, oblivion and pride. Many of the sketches have come from alumni, students and townspeople.

He has also received several from a postman in Harrisburg who noticed the "Little Lions" in the Alumni News when it came through the mail. Sharon Gallagher, graduate student in art and architectural history from Allentown, has contributed many drawings which have been used in the various letters.

These little lion sketches have been blown up for huge wall panels which are on display in Pollock Halls. According to Otto Mueller, director of housing, ten different "Little Lions" were chosen to depict the outstanding football games in Penn State history.

These sketches appear on 22 panels which are framed and put under glass in each of the Pollock dormitories and in the Pollock Dining Area. Each drawing is exactly the same as the original sketch and has the game, date and score of the game on it.

The games which are represented include both victories and defeats, the latter being games Penn State was not ashamed to lose, Riley said. They include the Rose Bowl in '23, the Cotton Bowl in '48, the two Liberty Bowls, the Ohio State game, and the Syracuse game in '59.
