

This Is The Daily Collegian

THE CITY ROOM is where most of the work for the paper is done. In the foreground is the rim where all the headlines are written.

Student Staff Runs Paper

Publishing a daily newspaper with a circulation of 8000 is a full-time proposition for the members of The Daily Collegian which is completely student staffed.

Every campus event from intramural boxing to student government to a business administration faculty meeting comes under the beat of some Collegian reporter or photographer.

Staffers check the assignment sheet daily, cover meetings, get interviews and write their stories.

Advanced members supervise headline writing and copy reading.

National and international news is provided by the Associated Press wire service.

Operating The Daily Collegian which has a readership of over 20,000 costs approximately $70,000 per year.

Photo Feature by John Beauge

CITY EDITOR Susie Linkroum edits a story written by John Morris. All the news stories going into the paper are read by the city editor.

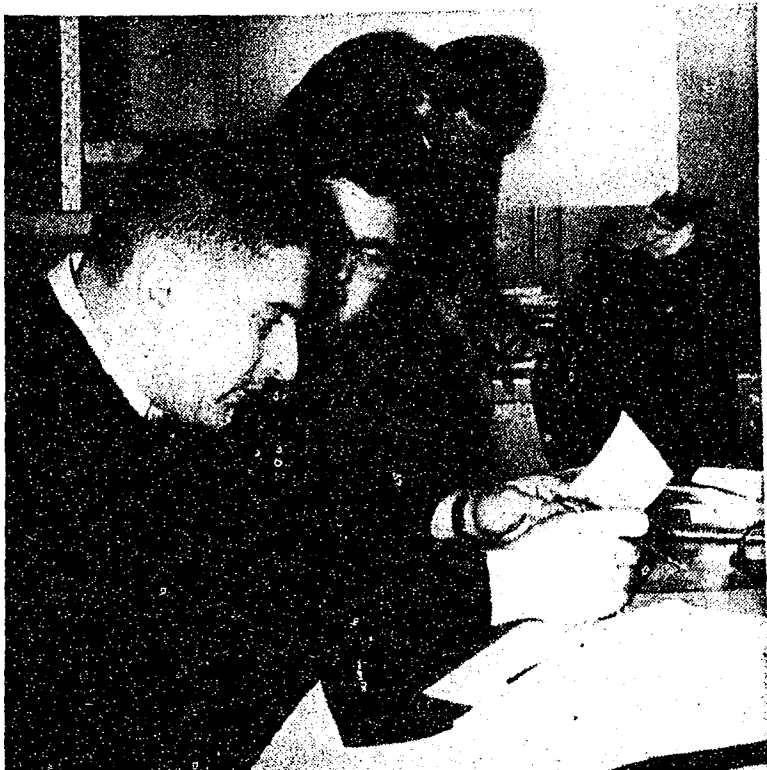

PHOTOGRAPHY EDITOR Rick Bower works the engraving machine as he prepares the pictures for the paper.

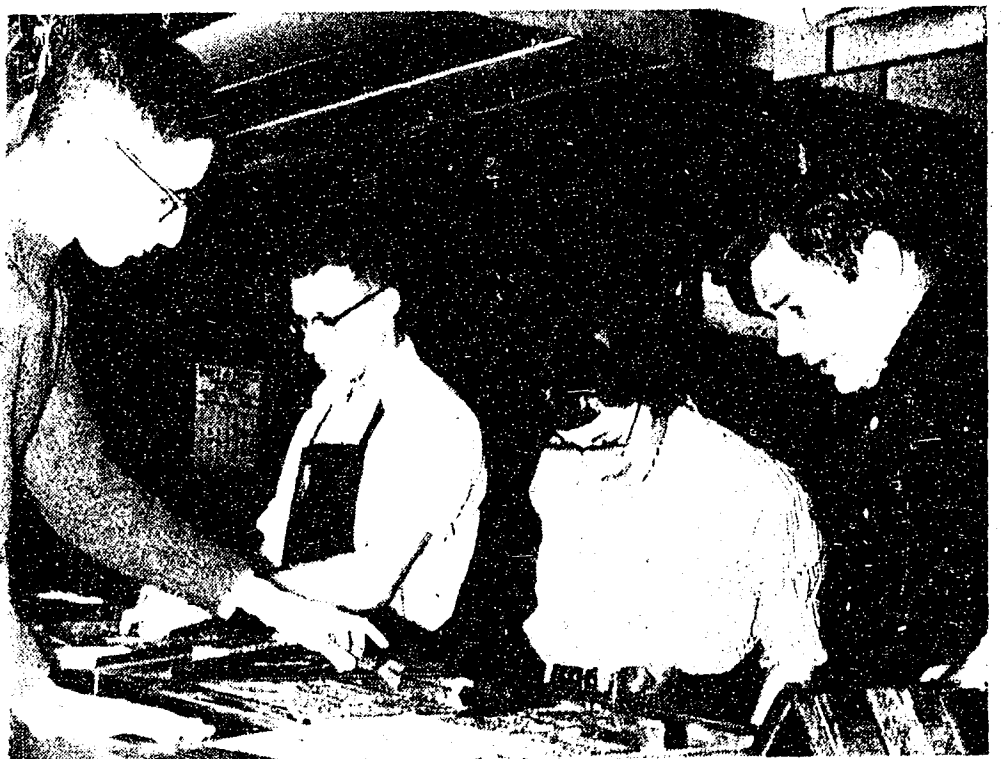

EDITORIAL WRITING: John Black, editor, and Nicki Wolford, assistant editor, discuss topics for the night's editorial. They also decide on the make-up of the editorial page.

NIGHT WIRE EDITOR Dick Leighton reads the Associated Press wire copy as it comes off the machine.

SPORTS EDITOR Sandy Padwe edits Dave Leonard's story as the latter looks on. In the background, Jim Karl checks his story.

LAYING OUT THE PAPER begins each night after 11 p.m. at the Centre Daily Times print shop. Joel Myers, (left) assistant city editor, and Elaine Miele, copy editor, discuss a possible page layout with two of the typographers.