Meteorologists are at the beginning of a new observational era, Wexler said. The future holds such advancements as polar orbiting and equatorial satellites to give a more complete picture of cloud formations over the earth, a world weather center to which information could be relayed and a cooperative system among countries whereby any nation could receive direct information.

Mexler concluded by comments of the advancement of meteorology is not only a technical one, but may become politically important if meteorologists in one country know what's going on above another country before that country itself knows.

This would occur if one nation's weather satellites were more advanced than another's.
