

Collegians Missing Drinking and Kissing

While students in colleges and universities throughout the nation are going to their state legislatures with such problems as lack of money, discrimination and overcrowded conditions, students at Bowling Green State University in Ohio may stand alone as the true defenders of collegiate "independence."

Unhappy about a ban on beer, good-night kissing and other "problems," a group of students complained to state legislators Tuesday. They plan to ask the Ohio General Assembly to investigate the grievances against their alma mater.

The complaining students are reported as having denied that off-campus beer drinking and kissing in front of the women's residence halls were major issues in demonstrations held at the university last week, but reports have listed them among the chief complaints.

Among the grievances the students presented to the legislature were:

- A curb on student expression in the school newspaper.
- Ineffective student government.
- Insufficient sections of popular courses.

- A poor system of academic counseling.
- Strict attendance rules.
- Lack of student representation in student governing positions.
- Double jeopardy in student court.

The complaints came as an aftermath of three days of rioting and class boycotting at the university last week. The riots, which were termed as a display of "spring fever," supposedly started with 25 fraternity men in a water fight. Although general discontent has been implied as the cause of the riots, no actual reason for them has been given.

After two nights of rioting on campus and in the downtown Columbus area the number had swelled to "between 500 and 1000." R. Licking over the campus and in local backyards the stellar

Reactions to DARE Attacked

By LYNNE CEREFICE

The refusal of several student organizations to support DARE's (Direct Action for Racial Equality) campaign indicates their adoption of a general campus attitude of "running" away from controversy, according to Preston N. Williams, acting University Chaplain.

Williams statement referred to the student groups (Association of Women Students, Interfraternity Council, Panhellenic Council and the SGA Committee on Inter-Racial Relations) who declined to issue statements supporting DARE's campaign against Greek discrimination.

In the past three weeks, the members of DARE have approached these various organizations asking them to back a drive to eliminate discriminatory clauses in fraternity and sorority constitutions within the next five years.

The negative response of these organizations, Williams said, is an example of Penn State's historical fear of conflict.

"This is unfortunate for the whole campus because it means that students can never come to grips with life as it is lived in a larger society," he said.

Williams said the members of these organizations are saying they would prefer "peace and harmony among all white students, especially white Protestants, to the risk of splitting their groups on one question."

In reference to the refusal of

IFC and Panhel to support DARE's campaign, Williams said: "It seems to me that no Negro or Jewish fraternity or sorority could continue in fellowship with these councils with integrity."

Williams also said that the conception of brotherhood and fellowship among Greeks seems to mean that those Greeks who happen to be also Jews and Negroes would be on the basis of full parity with all the others. "And I say this as a Greek myself," he added.

Commenting on a remedy for Greek discrimination, he said: "If these students are of the opinion that they can alter the constitutions of their fraternities and sororities, then they are hopelessly naive."
