Grad School Enrollment Increases

The enrollment of the graduate school has increased approximately eight per cent each year since its founding in 1922, according to Henry W. Knerr, Associate Dean of the graduate school.

This year's graduate school enrollment is approximately 2305 with another 8 per cent increase expected next year, Knerr said.

At present 70 fields of study are offered which lead to both master's and doctorate degrees. An additional 20 fields of study lead to the masters degree.

Four new fields leading to a masters degree will probably be offered next year, Knerr said. They are solid state technology, earth science, biophysics and anthropology.

Although the present graduate school was not founded until June 12, 1922, 522 "advanced degrees" had been awarded by that time.

The first two graduate students enrolled at Penn State in 1862, three years after its founding. One received his Master of Scientific and Practical Agriculture. The other died a year later without receiving his degree.

Dr. Frank B. Kern, professor of botany, was made dean of the graduate school in 1922. The present dean, Harold K. Schilling, took office in 1950.

By 1950, with the enrollment at 1400, well over 5,000 degrees had been awarded since the school's founding.

Modern Poetry Featured by Pivot

Pivot, the student poetry magazine, features poetry in the modern idiom, according to Joseph Grucci, creator of the magazine.

Grucci established Pivot 11 years ago in his poetry workshop, referred to in the course catalogue as English 113.

Grucci refers to his students as attempting to write "fresh, clear, and modern poetry." "They make it a point to avoid such taboo themes as 'love' and 'spring,'" he said.

David Adams, senior in liberal arts from Havertown, who is now editor of Pivot, said, "We want freshness in approach. The poetry should originate in the student's mind."

Eleven years ago Pivot had a circulation of 450. It now has a circulation of 2,000 reaching students at colleges across the country. The Pittsburgh Press has carried feature articles on Pivot.

The poetry workshop is a 3 credit course now being offered every semester starting in the fall. Although the poetry workshop publishes Pivot, the magazine's contributors may be faculty members, graduate students and undergraduates.

Concerning the course, Adams said, "The class learns expression and how to handle words. We criticize each other's work every week."

The poetry workshop is such a popular course that many students take it more than once, Adams said. The course now has two sections.

Every week when the students' poems are handed in, Grucci has the work mimeographed on sheets of paper for the whole class to read, analyze, and criticize.

Grucci said that Pivot is a self-sustaining publication and copies are being sold at the Hetzel Union desk.
