Graduate Students To Help Youths In Rehabilitation

Graduate students in the social sciences may be working with the State College Borough Police in a rehabilitation program for handicapped children and young people, John R. Juba, chief of police, said last night in an interview after the Borough Council meeting.

The allotment of state and federal funds for the program depends on whether the borough has the minimum number of 7,000 children under 18 years of age, Juba said.

The program would be continuous and cover all juvenile delinquent cases and those involving handicapped children, Juba said.

The arrangement with the University that graduate students help in the program is pending, Juba said, but he added that the plans "are expected" to go through.

Juba also told the council that on Oct. 10 the Police Department will begin a 20-week program of basic instruction in police principles. The Department of Public Instruction has appointed Mr. Juba to teach the course which will be held for two and a half hours one evening a week. The class will probably be limited to about 20 men, Juba said.

In other business the council decided that the Board of Adjustments must go before a public hearing at 7:30 p.m. Nov. 6 to make a minor change in the Zoning Ordinance.

Counseling Services Aid Confused Fresh

Freshmen no longer need to be worried or confused about their choice of careers, thanks to the efforts of Dr. Donald H. Ford and his staff in the Division of Counseling.

Every freshman entering the University or one of the commonwealth campuses offering the baccalaureate degree receives an intensive counseling program before he arrives on campus for registration. This program, started in 1956, consists of various interest and aptitude tests and a day of counseling during the summer.

The counseling program here is unique in that parents are involved in a pre-registration counseling program. The program is focused not on orientation to college life, but on the academic side of the University — planning a career to fit the individual, Ford said.

The University is one of the few major schools to require counseling sessions with every freshman and follow them up with needed attention throughout his undergraduate life. A student may go to the Division of Counseling anytime for help if he is dissatisfied or having trouble in his curriculum.

One out of every five freshmen changes his major before registration. By the time he has reached junior standing, one of every two students has changed his major at least once, Ford said.

It is important for the individual to decide for himself what to do, said Ford, director of the program. There are a number of careers for each person. "Our problem is to help the individual narrow down his choice to a range of things in which he will be happy and successful," he said.

The counselor also gives the student a prediction of his grade point average for his first semester.

These predictions are to motivate students to do their best work and to show them how good they can be if they really try, Ford said. They are also to let the student and his parents know what can be expected in grades, he said.
