

Room Numbers Will Accelerate Mail Deliveries

Although there is confusion now in many of the campus post offices, the use of room numbers instead of box numbers in students' addresses will improve mail deliveries, Otto E. Mueller, associate director of housing service, said yesterday.

Post office clerks are working on the usual volume of improperly addressed mail, he said. They are hopeful, however, that this volume will decrease rapidly as students advise their correspondents of their new addresses, he added.

The proper address includes the student's name, his room number, residence hall and University Park, Pa., Mueller said.

All students living in campus residence halls were advised prior to reporting to the campus of the revised procedure for addressing mail.

"The box number is used only to enable the student to locate the box in which his mail is placed," he emphasized.

Mueller pointed out that the use of a box number in an incomplete address may result in the delivery of that mail to boxes in the wrong residence hall or even to post office boxes in State College.

Improperly addressed mail has always been a problem, especially at the opening of a new term, he added.

4-Term--
(Continued from page one) its more intensive program. "The biggest objection I find is that while parents like the idea of buildings not being vacant," Walker said, "They don't want their own sons or daughters to attend a summer term."

The president added that he doesn't think all students should attend the term because a continuous period of study during one year would hinder rather than help them.

In the future, Walker sees more students taking a vacation during the winter rather than the summer term so that they can obtain more profitable employment.
