

Drive May Promote Better Mail Service--

(Continued from page three) University to inform regular correspondents of his correct address, including room number and name of building." Diehl said. He added that the volume of mail is now so large that this information is essential to efficient service.

Diehl said that the problem primarily concerns second class mail which includes newspapers, magazines and journals. "If we could improve in this category alone, we not only would save money, but we also would speed the overall service appreciably," Diehl said.
